⁴⁸ Richard Kuisel, Seducing the French: The Dilemma of Americanization (Berkeley, Calif., 1993); Reinhold Wagnleitner, Coca-Colonization and the Cold War (Chapel Hill, N.C., 1997); Uta G. Poiger, Jazz, Rock, and Rebels: Cold War Politics and American Culture in a Divided Germany (Berkeley, Calif., 2000); Heide Fehrenbach and Uta G. Poiger, eds., Transactions, Transgressions, Transformations: American Culture in Western Europe and Japan (New York, 2000); David F. Crew, ed., Consuming Germany in the Cold War (New York, 2003); Victoria de Grazia, Irresistible Empire: America’s Advance through Twentieth-Century Europe (Cambridge, Mass., 2005); Jonathan R. Zatlin, The Currency of Socialism: Money and Political Culture in East Germany (New York, 2007); Katherine Pence and Paul Betts, eds., Socialist Modern: East German Everyday Culture and Politics (Ann Arbor, Mich., 2008).

⁴⁹ The major exception here is Eley, who devotes more than ten pages of A Crooked Line to the early work on race and empire by Stuart Hall, Paul Gilroy, Ranajit Guha, and Gayatri Spivak (138–148). In part, this is because Eley’s is the only Europeanist genealogy to reckon with the Birmingham Center for Contemporary Cultural Studies and the Subaltern Studies Group. For more recent studies of race

Initiated during the mid-1960s, as Levine himself was actively involved in the U.S. civil rights movement, Black Culture and Black Consciousness espoused many of the same basic assumptions as the work of the British Marxists. Much like Thompson's The Making of the English Working Class, Levine's epic study of "Afro-American folk thought" was a "history from below" that sought new ways of conceptualizing "resistance." Like Thompson as well, Levine figured culture as a repertoire of "resources"—rituals, traditions, and customs through which an oppositional politics persevered. For Levine, however, these innovations emerged from a somewhat different set of commitments. As Walter Johnson has noted, the strong rhetorical emphasis on "self-determination" in Black Culture and Black Consciousness had obvious affinities with the civil rights politics of the late 1960s.⁵⁰ And the "determinisms" against which Levine framed his arguments generally came in the form of psychoanalytic theories of victimization (e.g., Stanley Elkins's somewhat earlier description of the antebellum slave plantation as a "total institution").⁵¹

We can extend this line of comparison to the more discursive modes of analysis that began to flourish during the 1980s. On the European side, one of the earliest efforts in this regard was Gareth Stedman Jones's Languages of Class (1983), an important but controversial study that generated enormous discussion among the British New Left.⁵² Although Jones's work was cited widely by U.S. labor historians, it would be difficult to argue for a strict parallelism—in part because the often contentious debates around class and culture never achieved the same centrality in U.S. circles.⁵³ If we shift the focus to race, however, the patterns look very different. Only three years after the publication of Languages of Class, Michael Omi and Howard Winant's landmark study Racial Formation in the United States (1986) performed a similar deconstructive maneuver by describing race (a category that had long been understood as self-evidently tied to physiology) as an ideological construct traceable across shifting patterns of discourse. Over the next decade, this new way of thinking and empire by Europeanists, see Kathleen Paul, Whitewashing Britain: Race and Citizenship in the Postwar Era (Ithaca, N.Y., 1997); Catherine Hall, Civilising Subjects: Metropole and Colony in the English Imagination, 1830–1867 (Chicago, 2002); Sonya O. Rose, Which People's War? National Identity and Citizenship in Wartime Britain, 1939–1945 (New York, 2004); Heide Fehrenbach, Race after Hitler: Black Occupation Children in Postwar Germany and America (Princeton, N.J., 2005); Gary Wilder, The French Imperial Nation-State: Negritude and Colonial Humanism between the Two World Wars (Chicago, 2005); Todd Shepard, The Invention of Decolonization: The Algerian War and the Remaking of France (Ithaca, N.Y., 2006); Rita Chin, The Guest Worker Question in Postwar Germany (New York, 2007); Rita Chin, Heide Fehrenbach, Geoff Eley, and Atina Grossman, After the Nazi Racial State: Difference and Democracy in Germany and Europe (Ann Arbor, Mich., 2009).

⁵⁰ Walter Johnson, "On Agency," Journal of Social History 37, no. 1 (Autumn 2003): 113–124.

⁵¹ Stanley M. Elkins, Slavery: A Problem in American Institutional and Intellectual Life (Chicago, 1959). For helpful context on these questions, see Lawrence W. Levine's autobiographical preface to the 30th Anniversary Edition of Black Culture and Black Consciousness: Afro-American Folk Thought from Slavery to Freedom (New York, 2007). It is important to be clear here, as well, that Levine's work was part of a much broader wave of landmark African American cultural histories that included studies by John Blassingame, Nathan Huggins, Sterling Stuckey, Albert Raboteau, Deborah Gray White, Charles Joyner, and Nell Irvin Painter (among many others). This rich body of work, much of it by African American scholars, is yet another important subfield occluded by the recent turn talk.

⁵² Gareth Stedman Jones, Languages of Class: Studies in English Working Class History, 1832–1982 (Cambridge, 1983); Eley, A Crooked Line, 9.

⁵³ For examples of Americanist reactions to Jones's work, see Michael H. Frisch and Daniel J. Walkowitz, eds., Working-Class America: Essays on Labor, Community, and American Society (Urbana, Ill., 1983).

about race quickly became a sign of the times, extending from Alexander Saxton's The Rise and Fall of the White Republic (1990), Tomás Almaguer's Racial Fault Lines (1994), and Kathleen Brown's Good Wives, Nasty Wenches, and Anxious Patriarchs (1996) to Neil Foley's The White Scourge (1997), Philip Deloria's Playing Indian (1997), and Robert Lee's Orientalists (1999).⁵⁴

These examples illustrate some of the dangers of our turn talk, the vast expanses of major scholarship behind the generational "we." But the dangers are hardly unique to the U.S. field. Shifting the frame to Latin American history, for instance, reveals a very different conception of "the social" (here grounded in "dependency theory"), politics (focused more explicitly on U.S. imperialism), and key works in cultural history (almost none of which appear in the footnotes of the leading European and U.S. creation stories).⁵⁵ Shift the frame again to the fields of late ancient and medieval history, and the debates look different still: this time, pivoting around the ritual-centered analyses of innovators such as Peter Brown, Caroline Walker Bynum, and Miri Rubin.⁵⁶ Even here, though, we are still seeing only part of the larger picture.

LET US SHIFT THE FRAME one last time, but now to the somewhat later waves of culturalists that arrived after the 1980s.⁵⁷ These cohorts have occupied a rather odd genealogical position. Again and again, the specific moment of their training has been described as the historiographical apex of the turn.⁵⁸ In many cases, too, they ⁵⁴ Alexander Saxton, The Rise and Fall of the White Republic: Class Politics and Mass Culture in Nineteenth-Century America (London, 1990); Tomás Almaguer, Racial Fault Lines: The Historical Origins of White Supremacy in California (Berkeley, Calif., 1994); Brown, Good Wives, Nasty Wenches, and Anxious Patriarchs; Neil Foley, The White Scourge: Mexicans, Blacks, and Poor Whites in Texas Cotton Culture (Berkeley, Calif., 1997); Philip J. Deloria, Playing Indian (New Haven, Conn., 1997); Robert G. Lee, Orientalists: Asian Americans in Popular Culture (Philadelphia, 1999).

⁵⁵ See, for example, the debates that run from William H. Beezley, Cheryl English Martin, and William E. French, eds., Rituals of Rule, Rituals of Resistance: Public Celebrations and Popular Culture in Mexico (Wilmington, Del., 1994); to Florencia E. Mallon, "The Promise and Dilemma of Subaltern Studies: Perspectives from Latin American History," American Historical Review 99, no. 5 (December 1994): 1491–1515, and Stephen H. Haber, "The Worst of Both Worlds: The New Cultural History of Mexico," Mexican Studies/Estudios Mexicanos 13, no. 2 (Summer 1997): 363–383; to Gilbert M. Joseph, Catherine C. LeGrand, and Ricardo D. Salvatore, eds., Close Encounters of Empire: Writing the Cultural History of U.S.–Latin American Relations (Durham, N.C., 1998); to the essays by Susan Deans-Smith, Gilbert M. Joseph, Eric Van Young, William E. French, Mary Kay Vaughn, Susan Migden Socolow, Claudio Lomnitz, and Stephen H. Haber in Mexico's New Cultural History: ¿Una Lucha Libre?, Special Issue, Hispanic American Historical Review 79, no. 2 (1999).

⁵⁶ See, for example, Martin and Miller, The Cultural Turn in Late Ancient Studies; Rubin, "What Is Cultural History Now?" Key texts here include Peter Brown, The Making of Late Antiquity (Cambridge, Mass., 1978); Caroline Walker Bynum, Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Medieval Women (Berkeley, Calif., 1987); and Miri Rubin, Corpus Christi: The Eucharist in Late Medieval Culture (Cambridge, 1991).

⁵⁷ This would include my own cohorts, first during my years as an undergraduate major in European cultural history at Princeton University from 1984 to 1988, and then as a UC-Berkeley Ph.D. student in U.S. cultural history from 1990 to 1996.

⁵⁸ See, for example, Appleby, Hunt, and Jacob, Telling the Truth about History, which cites publication statistics as evidence of the cultural turn's expansion (219). In "The New Empiricism," Cultural and Social History 1, no. 2 (May 2004): 201–207, Carla Hesse makes a similar point, arguing that cultural history was transformed during the 1980s and 1990s from "a minor (albeit highly prized) sideshow into the main event in the big tent of the historical profession" (204). In Hesse's version of events, however, this claim is not attached to a declensionist narrative.

have found themselves depicted as a kind of motor: the graduate-student groundswell driving the turn's expansion. Sewell, for example, describes the late 1980s as the watershed moment when cultural history became the discipline's "major growth area," attracting "the best students in the major centers of graduate training." Along with other key indicators (such as Hunt's 1989 volume), these swelling ranks of culturalists mark a kind of apotheosis in Sewell's narrative, the pivotal moment when cultural history "usurped definitively the hegemonic position achieved by social history only a decade earlier."⁵⁹

For the most part, though, these narratives have had little or nothing to say about what the "students" actually produced. To the extent that they cite any recent scholarship (that is, beyond the early 1990s), it has typically come in a single bundled footnote.⁶⁰ And comparatively, at least, the retrospective narratives have imagined the immediate past as strangely uneventful: a long and placid epilogue to the "bracing debates" of the 1980s. This sequence, however, elicits a number of lingering questions. One involves the longer history of the "students." Did their own trajectories simply replicate those of their teachers? And if not, what difference did it make to enter the mix sometime after the new cultural history—in its epistemic and professional wakes? If one cohort's turns found their expression in mid-career conversion experiences, what about those for whom many of the very same ideas, texts, and debates were methodological starting points, the more mundane stuff of first-year graduate syllabi?⁶¹

These questions require more than a mere extension of chronology. As Eley has observed in one of the few acknowledgments of generational diversity, those trained in the years following the "overheated polemics" of the 1980s have been "markedly less excited" about rehashing the older "battles." And with distance, he suggests, there have been new "possibilities" for creative thinking. Whereas the first waves of turners may have felt the need to maintain "the programmatic advocacy of one authorizing form of theory against another," the more recent cohorts have been some-

⁵⁹ Sewell, Logics of History, 48.

⁶⁰ See, for example, Bonnell and Hunt, Beyond the Cultural Turn, 32 n. 31, where they thank Sara Maza for drawing their attention to the importance of recent work on material culture by Leora Auslander, Ken Alder, and Jennifer Jones. For exceptions to this pattern, see Eley's frequent references to "younger historians" and "younger people" in A Crooked Line, 158, 201, 202. For other genealogies that similarly track the shifting boundaries of cultural history beyond the mid-1990s, see Peter Burke, "Afterword: Cultural History in the Twenty-First Century," in Burke, What Is Cultural History?, 130–143; and Jean-Christophe Agnew, "Capitalism, Culture, and Catastrophe," in Cook, Glickman, and O'Malley, The Cultural Turn in U.S. History, 383–416.

⁶¹ We might wonder as well about the "macrosocial forces" that have sometimes driven the supersession narratives. In Sewell's story, especially, it is precisely the inability of cultural turners to respond intellectually, methodologically, or politically to the shifting tides of "world capitalism" that has sealed the field's obsolescence. In his telling, the turn emerges as a story of expiring paradigms, its practitioners fated to think in national, Fordist, and discursive terms at a moment when the larger forces of world history were pushing toward "flexible accumulation," "global circulation," and the need for "a more robust sense of the social" (80). This sequence makes sense, however, only if we accept two basic premises: first, that the turn itself was a bounded generational experience that began in the 1960s; and second, that those who followed in its wake were somehow numb to the social, economic, political, and cultural changes unfolding all around them. Indeed, by this logic, the "students" of Sewell's story function as a kind of lost generation: simultaneously raised on anti-apartheid movements, global proxy wars, NAFTA, IMF protests, Google, and YouTube, yet strangely unable to develop a mode of historical questioning resonant with their "macrosocial" environment. As I try to demonstrate below, much of this argument is belied by major trends within cultural history over the past two decades.

what freer to combine and revise, to create their own sorts of “hybrids” across the older methodological “antinomies.”⁶²

We can note these distinctions without dodging the accompanying critiques. In our current political conjuncture, especially, it is hard to argue with Eley’s suggestion that “even the most fervent” culturalists would do well to pay more attention to the “widening extremes of social inequality.”⁶³ Nor would most current practitioners disagree with Sewell’s central contention: that the expanding “juggernaut of world capitalism” requires something more than a “purely” discursive mode of questioning.⁶⁴ Methodologically, moreover, who would argue with Peter Mandler’s recent call for closer attention to the macro-level “throw” of the texts and discourses we cite as “dominant”?⁶⁵ Or Spiegel’s wise suggestion that we recast the cultural itself as a more fluid field of “semantics,” each new “repertoire” of signs regularly remade and “put to work” by ground-level actors?⁶⁶

So far, so good. But what of the related efforts to yoke these critical impulses to tales of supersession, the collective quest for something “beyond”? We might wonder again: beyond what, exactly? Beyond the early struggles to establish language, imagery, and perception as the very stuff of historical analysis? Absolutely. Beyond the older “antinomies” that pitted cultural against social, micro against macro, subjectivity against structure? One can only hope. Beyond a “radically” or “purely” discursive mode of questioning now said to dominate “current practice”? Well, maybe not so fast.

This putatively “radical” form of culturalism has been accused of many crimes. It threatens to “obliterate the social.” It “displace[s] our gaze from the poor and powerless.” It fosters tedious conversations about “how little we know and how little we can say.” Sometimes it even shares a “secret affinity with an emergent logic of capitalist development.”⁶⁷ It is a specter, moreover, that is said to have appeared in many guises. On some occasions, it has conjured methodological excess: a turn pursued too far.⁶⁸ But it has also referenced absence: an undertheorized “cultural stud-

⁶² Eley, A Crooked Line, 201. Spiegel, too, has made an effort to demonstrate the shifting theoretical positions on the question of semiotic determinism. See, for example, her comments on Pierre Bourdieu and Andreas Reckwitz in “Comment on A Crooked Line,” 411–412.

⁶³ Eley, A Crooked Line, 198.

⁶⁴ Sewell, Logics of History, 52, 62, 80.

⁶⁵ Mandler, “The Problem with Cultural History,” 96–97.

⁶⁶ Spiegel, “Comment on A Crooked Line,” 412.

⁶⁷ Bonnell and Hunt, Beyond the Cultural Turn, 11; Sewell, Logics of History, 52; Mandler, “The Problem with Cultural History,” 94; Sewell, Logics of History, 62. In a 2003 roundtable in the Journal of American History, David Roediger noted (and argued against) a similar set of declensionist rhetorics on the U.S. side: “At the least, the perception of a wholesale move toward cultural history, or even cultural studies, has mattered greatly in conditioning how U.S. historians see their field and its problems. The field’s ‘turn’ is actually variously described, usually by detractors—toward the literary, toward the postmodern, toward the ‘mantra’ of race, gender, and class, toward the linguistic, toward the subjective, as well as toward the cultural. Often a lament is registered also for what has been lost: the political, the economic, the solid. I have my doubts as to the empirical validity of such claims . . . To the extent that political economy survives . . . at all, it often does so in works that are fully alert to cultural history and theory.” “Interchange: The Practice of History,” 586.

⁶⁸ This metaphor of excess is often set in opposition to one of methodological emaciation: a figurative “thinning of the social.” For examples, see William H. Sewell, Jr., “Whatever Happened to the ‘Social’ in Social History?,” in Joan W. Scott and Debra Keates, eds., Schools of Thought: Twenty-Five Years of Interpretive Social Science (Princeton, N.J., 2001), 209–226. Here again, though, the “thinning” metaphor works only if the story ends in the mid-1990s.

ies"; an empirically thin "postmodernism." Follow the citations backward, and the picture becomes still murkier. In many cases, these claims arrive without footnotes. In others, the claimants cite each other.⁶⁹ In still others, we find grab bags of titles, with landmark discursive studies such as Gail Bederman's Manliness and Civilization (1995) and Ann Stoler's Race and the Education of Desire (1995) lumped together with hybrid sociocultural histories such as George Chauncey's Gay New York (1994)—more than half of which explores the social, political, and commercial institutions that shaped the very terms of sexual discourse.⁷⁰ Even these sorts of arguments, however, are belied by the longer cycle.

If we go back to the earliest genealogies by Hunt, Eley, and Samuel, we find a more measured series of portraits. In each case, that is to say, the authors were quick to emphasize that "most" of the early turners (themselves included) had stopped well short of an unalloyed "sign reading."⁷¹ Pull the story forward, and we discover a similar set of caveats. Spiegel, for example, has regularly emphasized the limited currency of "semiotic determinism"—both in prior practice and in current trends.⁷² Much the same can be said about Carla Hesse, who has argued for at least three basic trajectories of cultural history: one composed of "neo-idealists" (such as Keith Baker), who contend "that there is nothing—or nothing knowable—about human experience outside of language"; a second, "poststructuralist" camp (exemplified by Joan Scott), which has challenged "the assumption that discursive formations are the product of self-conscious, rational individuals"; and a third, considerably larger group (including Hesse herself) who continue to believe that "the social and cultural [are] mutually constitutive," that "text and context need to be understood on an equal footing and not as background and foreground."⁷³

Refreshing in this schema are its glimmers of reciprocal benefits. Rather than insisting on conceptual zero sums, Hesse describes tough but "productive" debate, an increasingly "sophisticated" methodological discourse. Refreshing, too, is her acknowledgment of dissonance—the simple fact that turners could disagree. At first glance, this may seem entirely obvious, especially in a lore cycle so often characterized by combat. For the most part, though, this combat has been figured as fights between turners and their others, insiders and outsiders, true believers and the unconverted. And in this respect, they have often fostered succeeding monoliths: a

⁶⁹ See, for example, Bonnell and Hunt, "Introduction," 31 n. 30, which cites Sewell; or Sewell, Logics of History, 79, where he cites Bonnell and Hunt.

⁷⁰ Bederman, Manliness and Civilization; Ann Laura Stoler, Race and the Education of Desire: Foucault's "History of Sexuality" and the Colonial Order of Things (Durham, N.C., 1995); Sewell, Logics of History, 48 n. 28. I am thinking here of parts II and III of Chauncey's brilliant study, where he spends more than two hundred pages embedding the discursive figures from part I ("fairy," "trade," "wolves," etc.) in a series of densely detailed social, commercial, and political contexts; Gay New York, 131–354.

⁷¹ See Samuel's decidedly ambiguous conclusion to "Reading the Signs, II," in which he describes semiotics as "a wonderful tool, and a splendid provocation to historical reflection and research," but then goes on to insist that "the historical record cannot be read only as a system of signs, however useful that might be" (245). In similar fashion, Eley described his own position in 1990 as resolutely "intermediate": at once "accepting" of "the basic usefulness and interest of poststructuralist theory," but also aware of its "real costs"; "Is All the World a Text?," in McDonald, The Historic Turn in the Human Sciences, 214.

⁷² Spiegel, "Comment on A Crooked Line," 409. See also Spiegel, "The Task of the Historian," 2–3, 3 fn. 5; and her editorial comments on Joan Scott's "Evidence of Experience" in Gabrielle M. Spiegel, Practicing History: New Directions in Historical Writing after the Linguistic Turn (New York, 2005), 200.

⁷³ Hesse, "The New Empiricism," 205, 206.

one-dimensional social giving way to an equally flattened cultural, a new cultural history supplanted by a vaguely defined beyond. What Hesse helps us to see, by contrast, is more of the ground-level diversity that has often made “the cultural” such a stimulating disciplinary location—a turn, in short, never reducible to a single methodological trick.

What, then, has this dissonance produced? On the U.S. side, much of the best recent work has tended to cluster in precisely those areas described as “absent,” “impoverished,” or “neglected” by the turn talk. Think, for example, of the growing attention to circulatory patterns (or, if you like, Mandler’s “throw”) developed by George Lipsitz on global hip-hop, Nan Enstad on working women’s consumption, Kirsten Silva Gruesz on Latino/a writing, Martha Sandweiss on western photographs, Brent Edwards on black internationalism, Meredith McGill on serial fiction, Penny Von Eschen on state-sponsored jazz tours, David Henkin on the postal system, Scott Casper on the commercial book trade, and Konstantin Dierks on Atlantic letter exchanges.⁷⁴ Or the long-running debates around appropriation, ideology, and counterpublics (in a nutshell, Spiegel’s “semantics”) pushed forward by Miriam Hansen on silent film, Robin Kelley on African American youth cultures, John Kuo Wei Tchen on Asian American performers, Michael Warner on early modern periodicals, John Stauffer on radical abolitionism, Philip Deloria on Native American film directors, and Joanna Brooks on black authorship.⁷⁵ Or, perhaps most strikingly, the recent waves of turn-savvy studies of slavery, labor, mass production, consumerism, and global capital developed by Kathy Peiss, Amy Dru Stanley, Walter Johnson, Lendol Calder, Sven Beckert, Janet Davis, Michael Zakim, Elizabeth Cohen, Barry ⁷⁴ Lipsitz, Dangerous Crossroads; Nan Enstad, Ladies of Labor, Girls of Adventure: Working Women, Popular Culture, and Labor Politics at the Turn of the Twentieth Century (New York, 1999); Kirsten Silva Gruesz, Ambassadors of Culture: The Transamerican Origins of Latino Writing (Princeton, N.J., 2002); Martha A. Sandweiss, Print the Legend: Photography and the American West (New Haven, Conn., 2002); Brent Hayes Edwards, The Practice of Diaspora: Literature, Translation, and the Rise of Black Internationalism (Cambridge, Mass., 2003); Meredith L. McGill, American Literature and the Culture of Reprinting, 1834–1853 (Philadelphia, 2003); Penny Von Eschen, Satchmo Blows Up the World: Jazz Ambassadors Play the Cold War (Cambridge, Mass., 2004); David M. Henkin, The Postal Age: The Emergence of Modern Communications in Nineteenth-Century America (Chicago, 2007); Scott E. Casper, Jeffrey D. Groves, Stephen W. Nissenbaum, and Michael Winship, eds., The Industrial Book, 1840–1880 (Chapel Hill, N.C., 2007); and Konstantin Dierks, In My Power: Letter Writing and Communications in Early America (Philadelphia, 2009). My brief inventories here are far from complete. At best, they represent fleeting snapshots of subfields in motion. I would also emphasize that they do not encompass a full range of current concerns in U.S. cultural history. Because I am responding to specific critiques within the turn narratives, I have necessarily left out major areas of scholarship that have figured less prominently in those narratives—e.g., the larger body of excellent work on space/place, empire, and borderlands (all of which similarly complicates the social/cultural divide). See, for example, Pekka Hämäläinen and Samuel Truett, “On Borderlands,” Journal of American History 98, no. 2 (September 2011): 338–361. Finally, it is worth noting that many of the titles in this paragraph could be slotted into more than one of the conceptual categories. Lipsitz’s Dangerous Crossroads, for example, exemplifies all three. For parallel attention to patterns of circulation in recent European cultural histories, see, for example, Adrian Johns, The Nature of the Book: Print and Knowledge in the Making (Chicago, 1998); and Pascale Casanova, The World Republic of Letters (Cambridge, Mass., 2004).

⁷⁵ Miriam Hansen, Babel and Babylon: Spectatorship in American Silent Film (Cambridge, Mass., 1994); Robin D. G. Kelley, Race Rebels: Culture, Politics, and the Black Working Class (New York, 1994); John Kuo Wei Tchen, New York before Chinatown: Orientalism and the Shaping of American Culture, 1776–1882 (Baltimore, 1999); Michael Warner, Publics and Counterpublics (Cambridge, 2002); John Stauffer, The Black Hearts of Men: Radical Abolitionists and the Transformation of Race (Cambridge, Mass., 2002); Philip J. Deloria, Indians in Unexpected Places (Lawrence, Kans., 2004); and Joanna Brooks, “The Early American Public Sphere and the Emergence of a Black Print Counterpublic,” William and Mary Quarterly 62, no. 1 (January 2005): 67–92.

Shank, Walter Friedman, Scott Sandage, Charles McGovern, Sarah Igo, Jane Kamensky, Sarah Stein, Seth Rockman, Bethany Moreton, Stephen Mihm, David Suisman, Alexis McCrossen, Lawrence Glickman, Samuel Zipp, Brian Luskey, and Andrew Zimmerman (among many, many others).⁷⁶

Perhaps the most familiar of these examples is Walter Johnson's Soul by Soul (1999), a widely influential history of antebellum slavery published the very same year as Bonnell and Hunt. At first glance, Johnson's core subject (the domestic U.S. slave trade), narrative arc (the transposition of human beings into chattel), and repertoire of sources (including probate inventories and tax records) suggest little that can be described as strictly or obviously cultural. The slaves in his story do not spin tales, tell jokes, or sing more than a few short verses. The only institution that receives much attention is the slave market itself.

Look a bit closer, though, and the boundaries begin to blur. A case in point is the list of "double-entry" slave sales that opens his second chapter. For much of the twentieth century, historians might have analyzed these long columns of names, dates, and prices through a strictly quantitative lens—or by some criterion of economic necessity. Historiographical debate might have turned on the bottom-line question of the slave trade's profitability—which in turn might have been used to construct much larger arguments for or against the "inevitability" of the Civil War. In Johnson's hands, by contrast, the quantitative data reveal more subtle personal motives. In recording their day-to-day transactions, slaveholders simultaneously “make themselves” and make their “social worlds.” In writing to relatives about “making a start” in the slave market, they “translate” the “productive and reproductive labor of their . . . slaves into images of their own upward progress.” And in computing the “necessity” of individual purchases, they do more than simply respond to the structural pressures of an increasingly far-flung trade. More accurately, Johnson argues, slaveholders “objectified” these “desires into necessities,” thereby “giving cultural meaning to the economy in people upon which their lives (or at least their livelihoods) depended.”⁷⁷

⁷⁶ Kathy Peiss, Hope in a Jar: The Making of America's Beauty Culture (New York, 1998); Amy Dru Stanley, From Bondage to Contract: Wage Labor, Marriage, and the Market in the Age of Slave Emancipation (New York, 1998); Walter Johnson, Soul by Soul: Life inside the Antebellum Slave Market (Cambridge, Mass., 1999); Lendol Calder, Financing the American Dream: A Cultural History of Consumer Credit (Princeton, N.J., 1999); Sven Beckert, The Monied Metropolis: New York City and the Consolidation of the American Bourgeoisie, 1850–1896 (New York, 2001); Janet M. Davis, The Circus Age: Culture and Society under the American Big Top (Chapel Hill, N.C., 2002); Michael Zakim, Ready-Made Democracy: A History of Men's Dress in the American Republic, 1760–1860 (Chicago, 2003); Lizabeth Cohen, A Consumers' Republic: The Politics of Mass Consumption in Postwar America (New York, 2003); Barry Shank, A Token of My Affection: Greeting Cards and American Business Culture (New York, 2004); Walter A. Friedman, Birth of a Salesman (Cambridge, Mass., 2004); Scott A. Sandage, Born Losers: A History of Failure in America (Cambridge, Mass., 2005); Charles F. McGovern, Sold American: Consumption and Citizenship, 1890–1945 (Chapel Hill, N.C., 2006); Sarah E. Igo, The Averaged American: Surveys, Citizens, and the Making of a Mass Public (Cambridge, Mass., 2007); Jane Kamensky, The Exchange Artist: A Tale of High-Flying Speculation and America's First Banking Collapse (New York, 2008); Sarah Abrevaya Stein, Plumes: Ostrich Feathers, Jews, and a Lost World of Global Commerce (New Haven, Conn., 2008); Seth Rockman, Scraping By: Wage Labor, Slavery, and Survival in Early Baltimore (Baltimore, 2009); Bethany Moreton, To Serve God and Wal-Mart: The Making of Christian Free Enterprise (Cambridge, Mass., 2009); Stephen Mihm, A Nation of Counterfeiters: Capitalists, Con Men, and the Making of the United States (Cambridge, Mass., 2009); David Suisman, Selling Sounds: The Commercial Revolution in American Music (Cambridge, Mass., 2009); Alexis McCrossen, ed., Land of Necessity: Consumer Culture in the United States–Mexico Borderlands (Durham, N.C., 2009); Lawrence B. Glickman, Buying Power: A History of Consumer Activism in America (Chicago, 2009); Samuel Zipp, Manhattan Projects: The Rise and Fall of Urban Renewal in Cold War New York (New York, 2010); Brian P. Luskey, On the Make: Clerks and the Quest for Capital in Nineteenth-Century America (New York, 2010); and Andrew Zimmerman, Alabama in Africa: Booker T. Washington, the German Empire, and the Globalization of the New South (Princeton, N.J., 2010). This long list necessarily flattens a wide range of issues: production and consumption; slavery, industrial labor, class formation, and entrepreneurship; contract theory, commodification, market research, and urban planning; currency speculation and the culture industries. It seems to me, however, that much of this recent work is bound together by a common impulse: to think across the conceptual zero sums, to think commerce and culture, markets and meanings, together. My own efforts in this regard include The Arts of Deception: Playing with Fraud in the Age of Barnum (Cambridge, Mass., 2001) and "The Return of the Culture Industry," in Cook, Glickman, and O'Malley, The Cultural Turn in U.S. History, 291–317.

Johnson makes good here on one of the central promises of the 1980s: namely, to push beyond “topics,” to reimagine the cultural itself as a more capacious field of “meaning-making.”⁷⁸ But he also does quite a bit more than this. Consider his central figure, “the chattel principle.” First invoked by J. W. C. Pennington (a former Maryland slave who became a prominent northern abolitionist), this “principle” operates on many different levels in Soul by Soul. On the one hand, it is very much a discursive formation that crystallized some of slavery’s most troubling and essential questions. How was it possible to transpose human beings into fungible commodities? What did it mean to create an entire category of personhood that could “be disrupted as easily as a price could be set”? The fact that Johnson begins with Pennington’s words signals our entry into a world of ideas, values, and perceptions—a world in which much of the historical drama will occur precisely “between” the lists of prices.⁷⁹

But not just ideas, values, and perceptions. Indeed, at many other moments, Johnson demonstrates with devastating clarity that Pennington’s “principle” was perhaps the ultimate material condition, a vast system of structural constraint. Driving his larger story are far-flung chains of commodification: from non-elite drivers to wealthy buyers and sellers; from the modest coffles of the Upper South to the large urban clearinghouses farther “down the river”; from the thousands of daily sales that devastated black lives to the further transposition of those lives in white wills, gifts, and estate sales; from the property’s initial form as a “person with a price” to its subsequent fungibility as collateral or start-up capital.⁸⁰

This hybrid mode of questioning points to a related form of capaciousness: namely, the multiple meanings of “market” that permeate Soul by Soul. In many instances, Johnson uses this term to describe a macro-level system, historically visible through its aggregate numbers, crop cycles, legal conventions, and distribution networks. At other times, though, he employs the same term to conjure a more nebulous set of pressures, at once constitutive of, and shaped by, the values, goals, and assumptions of those who built the larger system. In so doing, he draws our attention to a series of historical structures that were always inextricably doubled: institutional as well as ideological; material as well as semiotic; economic as well as discursive;

⁷⁷ Johnson, Soul by Soul, 83–86.

⁷⁸ See, for example, Hunt’s 1989 “warnings” about the need to move beyond a “cultural history defined topically” that might “degenerate into an endless search for new cultural practices to describe, whether carnivals, cat massacres, or impotence trials”; The New Cultural History, 9.

⁷⁹ “Between the Prices” is the title of Johnson’s second chapter.

⁸⁰ See especially chaps. 2, 3, 4, and 6 of Soul by Soul: “Between the Prices,” “Making a World out of Slaves,” “Turning People into Products,” and “Acts of Sale.”

macro as well as micro. The book's most riveting dramas, however, play out in still another sort of market: the notorious New Orleans clearinghouses that served as the final entrepôt. Yet even here, among the chains, pens, and auction blocks, Johnson pushes for greater historical complexity, multiple ways of seeing. Consider, for example, one of the book's most important conceptual passages:

The slave trade did not begin or end in the same place for traders, buyers, and slaves. For slaves, the slave trade was often much more than a financial exchange bounded in space and time. A slave trader's short-term speculation might have been a slave's lifelong fear; a one-time economic miscalculation or a fit of pique on the part of an owner might lead to a life-changing sale for a slave . . . Comparing the sources produced by those on different sides of the bargain makes it clear that "a slave sale" was not a single thing which one could view from three different sides and sum into a whole . . . Rather, like a web of unforeseen connections, the morphology of a sale depended upon the point of departure. Time ran differently depending upon where you started the clock.⁸¹

Following Bonnell and Hunt, it might be tempting to describe this as "beyond": the decisive methodological juncture at which commerce and culture, structure and meaning, finally collapse. There are, however, a number of basic problems with such a reading. One is that Johnson developed this mode of questioning during the early 1990s, at the very moment (or so we have been told) when the new cultural history was falling into its "radically discursive" rut. Another is that Johnson was never making this up from scratch. Indeed, if we go back to the 1995 dissertation on which Soul by Soul was based, his citations point to a more interesting set of mergers: key theoretical texts on "the social life of things" intermixed with legal history articles; landmark works on antebellum slavery by Eugene Genovese, John Blassingame, James Oakes, and Barbara Fields side by side with seminal studies of market cultures by Karen Halttunen, Jackson Lears, Jean-Christophe Agnew, and John Kasson.⁸² In retrospect, at least, it is easier to track the cross-currents. Agnew, for example, was among the first U.S. historians to feature the work of Karl Polanyi (whose seminal writings on "embeddedness" reverberate through much of Soul by Soul). Much the same might be said about Halttunen's uses of Norbert Elias, Georg Simmel, and Erving Goffman—all important early theorists for opening up the "performative" dimensions of class.⁸³

The other key point is that Johnson was never working in a vacuum. Push beyond slavery, in fact, and many of his central moves begin to look like broader ground-

⁸¹ Ibid., 14.

⁸² Walter Livezey Johnson, "Masters and Slaves in the Market: Slavery and the New Orleans Trade, 1804–1864" (Ph.D. diss., Princeton University, 1995), 1–12. The theoretical work on the "social life of things" came from anthropologists Mary Douglas, Arjun Appadurai, and Igor Kopytoff. See Appadurai, ed., The Social Life of Things: Commodities in Cultural Perspective (New York, 1986).

⁸³ There were, of course, additional precedents for these moves—some explicitly footnoted, others merely echoed. We might think, for example, of Joan Scott's 1988 essay "A Statistical Representation of Work: La Statistique de l'industrie à Paris, 1847–1848," much of which anticipates Johnson's against-the-grain readings of double-entry slave sales. Or Elizabeth Cohen's Making a New Deal: Industrial Workers in Chicago, 1919–1939 (New York, 1990); James Livingston's Pragmatism and the Political Economy of Cultural Revolution, 1850–1940 (Chapel Hill, N.C., 1994); and Ohmann's Selling Culture, all of which share Johnson's concern for tracking new forms of "subjectivity" within the structures of capitalism. Or Bederman's Manliness and Civilization and Brown's Good Wives, Nasty Wenches, and Anxious Patriarchs, both of whose non-linear narrative structures (and close attention to competing subject positions) parallel Johnson's "thrice-told tale" of the antebellum slave market.

swells, part of an always unfinished cultural that has continued to migrate and stretch, adapt and provoke. This still-unfolding process can be seen in the work of Stanley, Calder, Sandage, Kamensky, Rockman, Glickman, and Mihm—all recent historians of capitalism for whom signs and structures are deeply interwoven, never the stuff of conceptual zero sums. Or the growing interest in circulatory systems that cuts across Lipsitz's records, Sandweiss's photographs, Edwards's novels, Von Eschen's jazz tours, and Dierks's letters. Or the explicitly hybrid approaches to commodity chains that run through Enstad, Zakim, Shank, Stein, Moreton, and Zimmerman. Or the increasingly materialist studies of representation that connect McGill's newspapers, Casper's books, Igo's opinion polls, Zipp's blueprints, and my own work on black celebrity and the politics of global positioning.⁸⁴

Should we read these recent developments as cultural history's swan song? Its reinvigoration? The latest phase of its imperialist plotting? Such rhetorics of supersession ultimately reinforce the very same synecdoches I have sought to disrupt throughout this essay. So let us conclude here not with competing futurology (new "beyonds" for the same tired turns), but rather, with a series of broader suggestions for rethinking the debate itself.

First, we should keep in mind the long-running plasticity of cultural history, a notoriously capacious category that has always entailed a mobile, unfinished project. Before the new cultural history of the 1980s, there were dozens of older culturalists that pushed in a variety of competing directions. In a major review essay from 1968, self-identified practitioner David Brion Davis sought to familiarize his AHR readers with "recent directions in American cultural history." But at that point, Davis was summing up the myth and symbol scholarship that had first emerged with the American studies movement. Push back another decade or two, and one finds Caroline Ware's Cultural Approach to History (1940), a landmark edited collection (sponsored by the AHA) that included some of the era's most innovative historians. In Ware's hands, however, this "approach" was something different yet again: an explicitly "bottom up" mode of historicizing built upon the anthropology of Franz Boas.⁸⁵ Moving forward, then, we would do well to stop thinking in terms of superseding fashion cycles: a singular turn that simply rose and fell, supplanted and faded.

This leads to a related suggestion about parameters: the need to think more carefully—and capaciously—about what cultural history now is. The importance of this project hit home for me in a recent query from a colleague. "How," this colleague wanted to know, "is Soul by Soul cultural history? I just don't get it." We might respond here that Johnson spent much of the past two decades jointly appointed in an American studies program; or that many leading historians of slavery and capitalism have explicitly praised Soul by Soul for its strategic mixtures of commerce and culture, structural constraints and competing subjectivities; or that this sense of Johnson's accomplishment was shared by the American Studies Association, which awarded Soul by Soul its annual book prize in 2000. Johnson's citations, moreover, have often included scores of leading culturalists: Stuart Hall, Joan Scott, Michel de

⁸⁴ My current book project explores the first waves of African American artists, intellectuals, and political activists to strategize their circulation in relation to global markets, 1770–1930.

⁸⁵ Davis, "Some Recent Directions in American Cultural History"; Ware, The Cultural Approach to History; Cook and Glickman, "Twelve Propositions for a History of U.S. Cultural History," 5–29.

Certeau, Judith Butler, James C. Scott, David Roediger, Robin Kelley, Werner Sollors, Kathleen Brown, Joseph Roach.⁸⁶ At the end of the day, though, these point-by-point responses miss the larger problem. Wouldn't we expect cultural history to change over time? Why, then, cast it retrospectively as a singular bag of tricks: a fixed and finished turn somehow frozen in the Reagan era?

Finally, we would do well to reconsider the semantics of our turn talk: our tendency to speak of the turn to culture. Key innovations, it is often said, began locally but traveled widely. Meanings were made. Signs proliferated. Categories were deconstructed. In the process, whole blocks of major subfields—slavery, labor, capitalism, empire, borderlands, diplomacy—recalibrated, transformed. In many respects, it is an appealing family portrait (an entire discipline said to have sharpened its epistemic foundations), but one also prone to certain distortions. Most obviously, it misses those who were already practicing cultural history well before the 1980s.⁸⁷ But it also misses the reciprocal dimensions of turning to culture: the inevitable exchanges with other fields, the manifold pushbacks from other quadrants.

We have heard relatively little, in other words, about the multidirectional process by which cultural history itself—in the very act of turning—became more pluralistic in its methods; more omnivorous in its sources; more precise about causality; more attentive to competing theories of power; more open to numbers and networks; more sensitive to limits on agency, resistance, and self-fashioning; more focused on the interplay between meanings and markets, representational practices and policymaking; more ambitious in tracking global systems of capital. Some of the most sophisticated work in these areas has come from latter-day culturalists trained sometime after the new cultural history.⁸⁸ But it is hard to see this conceptual traffic if we continue to speak of one-way streets: a turn that never learned, converted but never changed.

⁸⁶ Much the same could be said about virtually any of the titles referenced in the final pages of this essay. Consider Rockman's award-winning labor history of early Baltimore, Scraping By. Much like Soul by Soul, Rockman's work is wonderfully alive to both the structural and discursive dimensions of his subject. Above all, he shows us antebellum capitalism's "systemic dependence on . . . multiple, simultaneous, and overlapping forms of inequality" (10). Indeed, his larger point is to develop a conception of "class" based less on shared "cultural" traditions (in the Thompsonian mode) than on constrained "choices" and shared forms of "subjugation." This does not mean, however, that Rockman is antagonistic to the methods and concerns of cultural history itself. Rather, he returns again and again to the "rhetorical tools" deployed in public debates about the city's political economy, the ventriloquized "voices" used by newspaper editors to promote commercial development, the "implicit racial or ethnic coding" running through the jobs ads, the multiple "perspectives" and "perceptions" of different categories of workers. For Johnson's citation patterns, see Walter Johnson, "Inconsistency, Contradiction, and Complete Confusion: The Everyday Life of the Law of Slavery," Law and Social Inquiry 22, no. 2 (Spring 1997): 405–433; and Johnson, "The Slave Trader, the White Slave, and the Politics of Racial Determination in the 1850s," Journal of American History 87, no. 1 (June 2000): 13–38. For characterizations of Johnson's work, see Agnew, "Capitalism, Culture, and Catastrophe," 401–405; Rockman, Scraping By, 7, 273 n. 15.

⁸⁷ This oft-neglected group encompassed some of the most sophisticated historians of the twentieth century. A short list on the U.S. side would include Caroline Ware, Constance Rourke, Merle Curti, Henry Nash Smith, Leo Marx, John William Ward, David Brion Davis, Alan Trachtenberg, John Cawelti, William R. Taylor, Warren Susman, Neil Harris, Robert Toll, Daniel Rodgers, Ann Douglas, John Kasson, Nathan Huggins, Lawrence Levine, Paul Boyer, John Blassingame, and Carroll Smith-Rosenberg—all turners to culture before the 1980s. The other missing group here, of course, is non-turners: the large numbers of skeptics who have never had much to do with cultural history.

⁸⁸ For telling recent examples in the U.S. field, see Beckert, Monied Metropolis; Zakim, Ready-Made Democracy; McGill, American Literature and the Culture of Reprinting; Sandage, Born Losers; Igo, The Averaged American; Stein, Plumes; Jessica M. Lepler, "1837: Anatomy of a Panic" (Ph.D. diss., Brandeis University, 2008); Eric Slauter, The State as Work of Art (Chicago, 2009); Moreton, To Serve God and Wal-Mart; Zipp, Manhattan Projects; Zimmerman, Alabama in Africa; Scott Reynolds Nelson, A Nation

It may be too late now to hope for a history of cultural history that is entirely free of turn talk. But perhaps we can think our way forward by recasting the larger enterprise: as turns, not turn; as turning, not turned. A turn, in short, figured with much the same basic dynamism we routinely ascribe to our larger discipline. A more compelling cultural turn: beyond the generational we.

of Deadbeats: An Uncommon History of America's Financial Disasters (New York, forthcoming). See also Johnson, "On Agency," and Brooks, "The Early American Public Sphere and the Emergence of a Black Print Counterpublic," as well as the "agenda" essays by James Cook, Nan Enstad, and Phillip Deloria in Cook, Glickman, and O'Malley, The Cultural Turn in U.S. History, 291–382.

James W. Cook teaches U.S. History at the University of Michigan. His publications include The Arts of Deception: Playing with Fraud in the Age of Barnum (Harvard University Press, 2001) and The Cultural Turn in U.S. History: Past, Present and Future, co-edited with Lawrence B. Glickman and Michael O'Malley (University of Chicago Press, 2008). His recent work has focused on the transnational dimensions of African American culture and politics. He is currently writing two books: one on the global circulation of African American artists, intellectuals, and activists between 1770 and 1930, to be published by W. W. Norton & Co.; the other on the many lives of cultural history, to be published by the University of Chicago Press.

AHR Forum
Another Set of Imperial Turns?

DURBA GHOSH

The border where generations meet is always an area of turbulence.

Ranajit Guha

DEPENDING ON WHICH SCHOLARS you ask and in which subfields of history you read, the “imperial turn” and its close cognate, the “new imperial history,” are either in decline or just emerging.¹ The “imperial turn” is often defined as a turn from the study of domestic or national history toward a study of empire, thus complicating the presumed territorial, cultural, and political boundaries between empires and nations. The “new” imperial history pits itself as a revision of the “old” imperial history, and focuses on culture, gender, and race rather than high politics, the economy, or military expansion. Both terms are used sparingly, however (even by the contributors to a recently published reader on the subject), and there is far from complete agreement about what each represents.²

While there are diverse fields in which one might trace an imperial turn or attempt to explain the newness of imperial history, scholarship in British imperial history provides a particularly rich example, in part because debates on how to study empire and how to measure the impact of imperial history on British history have long been the subject of vigorous disagreement.³ Moreover, the institutionalization of imperial history in the British academy makes it unusual in comparison to other

This article originated as a conference paper given at the annual meeting of the American Historical Association in San Diego in 2010, which was followed by a subsequent presentation to the Department of History at the University of Utah. I am especially grateful to my fellow panelists, Jay Cook, Judith Surkis, and Gary Wilder, particularly Judith, who read far too many drafts. Ray Craib, Tom Metcalf, Emma Rothschild, and Robert Travers were early readers of this essay, followed by anonymous reviewers for the AHR, Maria Fernandez, Sara Pritchard, Marina Welker, and Wendy Welford, all of whom made it a much stronger piece. Mistakes and omissions (of which there are many) are entirely my own.

¹ Antoinette M. Burton, ed., After the Imperial Turn: Thinking with and through the Nation (Durham, N.C., 2003); Stephen Howe, ed., The New Imperial Histories Reader (London, 2010); Kathleen Wilson, ed., A New Imperial History: Culture, Identity, and Modernity in Britain and the Empire, 1660–1840 (Cambridge, 2006). I contributed an essay to the Wilson volume.

² Stephen Howe, “Introduction: New Imperial Histories,” in Howe, The New Imperial Histories Reader, 1–16, here 9; see also I. Gerasimov, S. Glebov, A. Kaplunovski, M. Mogilner, and A. Semyonov, “In Search of a New Imperial History,” Ab Imperio 1 (2005): 33–55.

³ Other historiographical essays on British imperial history include David K. Fieldhouse, “Can Humpty-Dumpty Be Put Together Again? Imperial History in the 1980s,” Journal of Imperial and Commonwealth History 12, no. 2 (1984): 9–23; A. G. Hopkins, “Back to the Future: From National History to Imperial History,” Past and Present 164, no. 1 (1999): 198–243; Stephen Howe, “The Slow Death and Strange Rebirths of Imperial History,” Journal of Imperial and Commonwealth History 29, no. 2 (2001): 131–141; Richard Price, “One Big Thing: Britain, Its Empire, and Their Imperial Culture,” Journal of national historiographies.⁴ Although it is important to be both critical and mindful of the Europe-centered focus of the word “imperial” in the naming of the imperial turn and the new imperial histories, there is little denying the powerful hold that the European modern, or “hyperreal Europe,” has had on the founding and institutionalization of the discipline of history.⁵ Many scholars have noted that the new imperial history does a great job of telling us about Britain—England and Scotland in particular—but it is relatively less informative about Africa, Asia, or Latin America.⁶ Rather than mark this as a failure or declare the end of the imperial turn, we would do well to examine where future imperial turns might take us, particularly as we imagine a way to decolonize historical scholarship from its Europe-centered moorings. Gary Wilder’s essay in this forum suggests a different lineage for the imperial turn in France’s historiography, and there are other historical subfields that have turned toward thinking about their empires. Thus there are many more ways in which we might construct genealogies about the nature of imperial turns, the newness of imperial history, and their relationship to what are called “new imperialisms.”⁷

The British imperial turn has been the product of many historiographical changes over the last century, and in the last several decades it has engaged other historiographical turns—the global, the postcolonial, and the archival. From the height of Britain’s empire in the late nineteenth century (then considered a “new imperialism”) to our current moment, imperial history in Britain has shifted from the study of the British Empire toward world and global history in which the structuring effects of European colonialism are accorded less centrality than they once were. In tracking tensions between liberal and Marxist historiographies on empire, disagreements be-

British Studies 45, no. 3 (2006): 602–627; Shula Marks, “History, the Nation and Empire: Sniping from the Periphery,” History Workshop Journal 29 (1990): 111–119.

⁴ British imperial history also has the unique distinction of having institutionalized imperial history in four named professorial chairs in Britain: the Vere Harmsworth Professor of Imperial and Naval History and the Smuts Professor of Commonwealth History at Cambridge; the Beit Professorship of Commonwealth History at Oxford; and the Rhodes Professor of Imperial History at Kings College, London.

⁵ Dipesh Chakrabarty, Provincializing Europe: Postcolonial Thought and Historical Difference (Princeton, N.J., 2000).

⁶ Ania Loomba, Suvir Kaul, Matti Bunzl, Antoinette Burton, and Jed Esty, “Beyond What? An Introduction,” in Loomba, Kaul, Bunzl, Burton, and Esty, eds., Postcolonial Studies and Beyond (Durham, N.C., 2005), 29; Price, “One Big Thing,” 604; Durba Ghosh, “Gender and Colonialism: Expansion or Marginalization?” Historical Journal 47, no. 3 (2004): 737–755.

⁷ See, for instance, Karen Barkey, Empire of Difference: The Ottomans in Comparative Perspective (Cambridge, 2008); Jane Burbank and David L. Ransel, eds., Imperial Russia: New Histories for the Empire (Bloomington, Ind., 1998); Stephen F. Dale, The Muslim Empires of the Ottomans, Safavids, and Mughals (Cambridge, 2010); Peter Duus, The Abacus and the Sword: The Japanese Penetration of Korea, 1895–1910 (Berkeley, Calif., 1995); Amy Kaplan and Donald E. Pease, eds., Cultures of United States Imperialism (Durham, N.C., 1993); D. C. B. Lieven, Empire: The Russian Empire and Its Rivals (New Haven, Conn., 2001); Peter C. Perdue, China Marches West: The Qing Conquest of Central Eurasia (Cambridge, 2005); Ann Laura Stoler, Carole McGranahan, and Peter C. Perdue, eds., Imperial Formations (New York, 2007); Louise Young, Japan’s Total Empire: Manchuria and the Culture of Wartime Imperialism (Berkeley, Calif., 1998); Jun Uchida, Brokers of Empire: Japanese Settler Colonialism in Korea, 1876–1945 (Cambridge, Mass., 2011). For the growing scholarship on a post-9/11 U.S. “new imperialism,” see David Harvey, The New Imperialism (New York, 2003); Greg Grandin, Empire’s Workshop: Latin America, the United States, and the Rise of the New Imperialism (New York, 2006); Harry Harootyan, The Empire’s New Clothes: Paradigm Lost, and Regained (Chicago, 2004). Radical History Review 95 (Spring 2006) was devoted to the theme of “New Imperialisms.”

tween social and cultural historians, and differing views on the scale at which we should think about empires, we can see how one might write the histories of an imperial turn that goes global while being attentive to the states of exception to the norm that are produced from marginal, feminist, subaltern, and minority perspectives.⁸ While proponents of the imperial/postcolonial turn attempted to radically transform historical methodologies by engaging in close reading, questioning the symbolism of language, and exposing archival texts to deconstructive techniques, this move was strongly challenged by some imperial historians, who claimed that their methods were based wholly in archival research and empiricism rather than “theorizing.” One might look to feminist and queer studies approaches to reading archives as a kind of archival (re)turn that requires close reading of marginal perspectives as well as deep and thorough archival research.

The debates within the imperial turn in British studies have been suggestively described as a “family quarrel.” “In my view,” writes Stephen Howe, “the ‘family’ of [the new imperial history] is large, quarrelsome, and perhaps quite dysfunctional; while some members seem not to talk to one another at all.”⁹ We might gender this family metaphor and imagine the generational tensions between gray-haired patriarchs, younger matriarchs, and an unruly group of interdisciplinary graduate students, postdoctoral fellows, and untenured faculty setting off on a long road trip in an overstuffed minivan (the “kids” in the title of James Cook’s essay in this forum). This conflation of familial dysfunction with academic hierarchies evokes the phrase that Ann Laura Stoler used to encapsulate intimacy in colonial communities: “tense and tender ties,” a term with which we might think as we follow the generational shifts, shared ground, and disagreements in scholarship on the British Empire.¹⁰

If one of the thrusts of this forum is to mark a shift in historical methodologies through the specter of generational change, it may be equally important to note that these battles within the imperial turn are largely battles within a shared political project—anti-colonialism and anti-imperialism—with disagreements about the value of different disciplinary methodologies.¹¹ Many of the male elders who trained or taught imperial history in Britain developed their liberal opposition to empire as members of a wartime and postwar generation of men who did compulsory military service in such places as North Africa, Rhodesia, Kenya, and Malaya or lived through the Suez Crisis in 1956.¹² The experiences of the “founding fathers” were different ⁸ On the productive nature of the margins, see Homi Bhabha, “DissemiNation: Time, Narrative, and the Margins of the Modern Nation,” in Bhabha, ed., Nation and Narration (London, 1990), 291–322; Walter D. Mignolo, Local Histories/Global Designs: Coloniality, Subaltern Knowledges, and Border Thinking (Princeton, N.J., 2000). The state of exception has been fruitfully explained by Giorgio Agamben in State of Exception, trans. Kevin Attell (Chicago, 2005). The idea of exceptions and empire is worked through in Ashley Dawson and Malini Johar Schueller, eds., Exceptional State: Contemporary U.S. Culture and the New Imperialism (Durham, N.C., 2007); Julian Go, Patterns of Empire: The British and American Empires, 1688 to the Present (Cambridge, 2011).

⁹ Howe, “Introduction: New Imperial Histories,” 9.

¹⁰ Ann Laura Stoler, ed., Haunted by Empire: Geographies of Intimacy in North American History (Durham, N.C., 2006), chap. 2.

¹¹ See the growing body of histories authored by Niall Ferguson, whose robust defense of the British Empire as a lesson for contemporary American policy departs from this lineage: Empire: The Rise and Demise of the British World Order and the Lessons for Global Power (New York, 2003); Colossus: The Price of America’s Empire (New York, 2004).

¹² I am speaking of John Gallagher, Ronald Robinson, Peter Marshall, Eric Stokes, and Thomas Metcalf, respectively. See Wm. Roger Louis, “Historians I Have Known,” Perspectives, May 2001; Peter from those of the “matriarchs,” who also trained in imperial history, as well as post-colonial, feminist, and cultural studies.¹³

As Judith Surkis writes in her contribution to this forum, “a genealogical counternarrative can keep multiple strains of critical interrogation open for the historiographical future.” All of the essays in this forum challenge the presumption of closure that is offered by “turn talk,” and the marking of time, progress, and completion that it represents. My own compressed and selective genealogy is not intended to demonstrate past coherence but rather to argue for future possibilities, particularly in remaining critical of imperialism and its hegemonies. Although some historians of empire believe that history is an empirical and dispassionate discipline that can be “detached and apolitical,” studies of imperialism have in fact been profoundly shaped by political moments of colonialism that call for ongoing scholarly critique.¹⁴

IN BRITISH HISTORY, IMPERIAL HISTORY is often said to have begun with the publication in 1882 of John Seeley’s The Expansion of England, a series of lectures that were intended for undergraduates at Cambridge University. The book, which was coincident with Britain’s “new imperialism” and the “scramble for Africa,” was aimed at expanding the political history of domestic England by encouraging historians to study the history of Britain’s empire as part of a British political tradition or “Greater Britain.”¹⁵ Seeley’s lectures marked a turn toward imperial history (which included

J. Marshall, review of David Cannadine, Ornamentalism: How the British Saw Their Empire (New York, 2001), Reviews in History, June 2001, <http://www.history.ac.uk/ihr/Focus/Empire/reviews/marshall2.html#1>; Thomas R. Metcalf, Forging the Raj: Essays on British India in the Heyday of Empire (Delhi, 2005), 5–6. In the interest of full disclosure, I should state that I was a Ph.D. student of Tom Metcalf.

¹³ Ronald Hyam, “The Study of Imperial and Commonwealth History at Cambridge, 1881–1981: Founding Fathers and Pioneer Research Students,” Journal of Imperial and Commonwealth History 29, no. 3 (2001): 75–103. Hyam’s “founding fathers” are distinct from those I have identified. Among the “matriarchs” are contributors to the groundbreaking edited volumes produced in the 1990s: Antoinette Burton, ed., Gender, Sexuality, and Colonial Modernities (New York, 1999); Nupur Chaudhuri and Margaret Strobel, eds., Western Women and Imperialism: Complicity and Resistance (Bloomington, Ind., 1992); Julia Clancy-Smith and Frances Gouda, eds., Domesticating the Empire: Race, Gender, and Family Life in French and Dutch Colonialism (Charlottesville, Va., 1998); Claire Midgley, ed., Gender and Imperialism (Manchester, 1998); Ruth Roach Pierson and Nupur Chaudhuri, eds., Nation, Empire, Colony: Historicizing Gender and Race (Bloomington, Ind., 1998). For further reading, see Margaret Strobel, Gender, Sex, and Empire (Washington, D.C., 1994); Philippa Levine, ed., Gender and Empire (Oxford, 2004); Angela Woollacott, Gender and Empire (Basingstoke, 2006). Intellectual autobiographies by two important figures in this field show how central the emergence of feminist history and critical race theory was to transforming imperial history: Antoinette Burton, “Imperial Optics: Empire Histories, Interpretive Methods,” in Burton, Empire in Question: Reading, Writing, and Teaching British Imperialism (Durham, N.C., 2011), 1–23; Catherine Hall, “Introduction,” in Hall, Civilising Subjects: Colony and Metropole in the English Imagination, 1830–1867 (Chicago, 2002), 1–22.

¹⁴ John Darwin puzzles: “it seems unlikely that we will be able to take a detached and apolitical view of Europe’s empire-building for a long time to come . . . It may be an age before we regard it more coolly as a phase in world history”; Darwin, After Tamerlane: The Global History of Empire since 1405 (London, 2008), 23, 25.

¹⁵ J. R. Seeley, The Expansion of England: Two Courses of Lectures (London, 1883). Seeley’s text is often cited as an originary moment in the field of British imperial history: Catherine Hall, “Introduction: Thinking the Postcolonial, Thinking the Empire,” in Hall, ed., Cultures of Empire: Colonizers in Britain and the Empire in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries—A Reader (Manchester, 2000), 1–33; Howe, “Introduction: New Imperial Histories”; Karuna Mantena, Alibis of Empire: Henry Maine and the Ends of Liberal Imperialism (Princeton, N.J., 2010), 46–48; Kathleen Wilson, “Introduction: Histories, Em-

the study of the American colonies) at Cambridge; it was not until after World War II, however, that the subject of the empire was formally added to the undergraduate history curriculum, motivated in part by the return of ex-colonial officials as the decolonization of Britain's colonies began.¹⁶

A two-part undergraduate course known as "The Expansion of Europe from the Fifteenth Century to the First World War" was developed after the Second World War by several scholars at Cambridge, including Ronald Robinson and John Gallagher, because they felt that the undergraduate reading list was too narrowly focused on Britain and its "white" settler colonies (Canada, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, and the United States).¹⁷ The authors of the well-known article "The Imperialism of Free Trade," Robinson and Gallagher went beyond Seeley's definition of the British Empire and urged that all of Britain's colonies be included in the study of imperial history. "The conventional interpretation of the nineteenth-century empire continues to rest upon study of the formal empire alone," they wrote, "which is rather like judging the size and character of icebergs solely from the parts above the water-line." Thus they called for an understanding of the particular ("submerged") histories of each region that the empire had engaged politically and economically through the long nineteenth century, including Africa, the Middle East, Latin America, and the different nations of Asia.¹⁸ When Robinson and Gallagher wrote their magnum opus Africa and the Victorians (with the support of Alice Denny), they focused on the political and economic history of different regions of Africa, offering an explanation of historical change that emerged from the colonies rather than the metropole.¹⁹ Although they did not use the language of marginality, an examination of the proto-nationalist movements in African territories was crucial to their analysis, giving the history of colonized Africa a new kind of importance in generating historical change—a feature that was missing in Seeley's vision of "expansion," which presumed that Britain was at the center.

"The Expansion of Europe" integrated emergent scholarship on what was then called "extra-European history" in the United Kingdom and would later be called "area studies" in the United States. The course focused on Asia, Africa, the Middle East, and Latin America—the "rest" to Europe's "West"—and promoted the idea that the history of colonized areas needed further study if scholars were to gain a better understanding of the history of Europe and its colonialisms.²⁰ At the time, a colleague at Cambridge, E. H. Carr, a Marxist historian of the Soviet Union, noted derisively that the new syllabus did nothing to radically alter the average under-pires, Modernities," in Wilson, A New Imperial History, 1–26. The most detailed is Duncan Bell, The Idea of Greater Britain: Empire and the Future of World Order, 1860–1900 (Princeton, N.J., 2007), especially chaps. 4 and 6.

¹⁶ Hyam, "The Study of Imperial and Commonwealth History at Cambridge."

¹⁷ These colonies included many indigenous peoples whose lives and histories were subsequently erased in the process of colonial conquest.

¹⁸ John Gallagher and Ronald Robinson, "The Imperialism of Free Trade," Economic History Review, 2nd ser., 6, no. 1 (1953): 1–15, here 1.

¹⁹ Ronald Robinson and John Gallagher, with Alice Denny, Africa and the Victorians: The Official Mind of Imperialism (London, 1961).

²⁰ For more on Robinson and Gallagher's influence on the field of imperial history and area studies in Britain, see Wm. Roger Louis, "Introduction," in Robin W. Winks, ed., The Oxford History of the British Empire, vol. 5: Historiography (Oxford, 1999), 38–41.

graduate's sense of history as a universal idea emanating from a putatively liberal and Western tradition that put Europe firmly at the center of historical change. "The candidate," Carr sneered, "is not invited to know anything of countries with an important and well-documented history like China or Persia, except what happened when the Europeans attempted to take them over."²¹ In observing that history also existed in areas that had not come in contact with Europe, Carr astutely marked an elision within this school of British imperial history, an imbalance in historical scholarship that Eric Wolf and others would subsequently address.²² Carr's comments further marked a cleavage between the universalizing claims of liberal and Marxist critics of empire, a disagreement that continues to surface in debates between historians who attempt to imagine how a history of Africa, Asia, or Latin America might be written without Europe as a referent.²³

The Robinson and Gallagher thesis contested widely accepted accounts about the expansion of the British Empire by critics of empire such as J. A. Hobson, who influenced Marxist critics such as V. I. Lenin. Hobson felt that the free trade and anti-expansion liberalism of the mid-Victorian era had been abandoned by the late Victorians in favor of "economic imperialism." His sense of betrayal in the rupture between mid- and late Victorian liberalism was not shared by Robinson and Gallagher, who noted that throughout the nineteenth century, even when liberal leaders professed to oppose imperial expansion, they abetted it in times of crisis that were generated by local politics, economic depressions, and geopolitical rivalry.²⁴ They challenged Lenin's totalizing thesis on the relationship between monopoly capitalism and imperialism, and demonstrated that free-market liberalism could drive the expansion of capitalism into colonial monopolistic activity.²⁵ In leveling their criticisms against turn-of-the-twentieth-century thinkers such as Hobson and Lenin, Robinson and Gallagher argued from a position as Cold War democratic socialists, concerned as much about Soviet-style authoritarianism as about American imperialism, particularly in the aftermath of the Marshall Plan, the American response to the Suez crisis, U.S. involvement in the Korean War, and the growing tensions of the Cold War.²⁶ Africa and the Victorians, published in 1961, was a cautionary tale against the ²¹ E. H. Carr, What Is History? (London, 1961), 151.

²² Eric R. Wolf, Europe and the People without History (Berkeley, Calif., 1982); Michel-Rolph Trouillot, Silencing the Past: Power and the Production of History (Boston, 1995).

²³ Patrick Wolfe, "History and Imperialism: A Century of Theory, from Marx to Postcolonialism," American Historical Review 102, no. 2 (April 1997): 388–420. An argument for a "post-Eurocentric," "post-Marxist" historiography is John T. Chalcraft, "Pluralizing Capital, Challenging Eurocentrism: Toward Post-Marxist Historiography," Radical History Review 91 (Winter 2005): 13–39; Jeffrey N. Wasserstrom, "New Ways in History, 1966–2006," History Workshop Journal 64, no. 1 (2007): 271–294.

²⁴ J. A. Hobson, Imperialism (1902; repr., Ann Arbor, Mich., 1965); V. I. Lenin, Imperialism: The Highest Stage of Capitalism (1916; repr., New York, 1933). For one of the best accounts of the development of "imperialism," see Wolfgang J. Mommsen, Theories of Imperialism, trans. P. S. Falla (New York, 1980). The Robinson and Gallagher debate is well encapsulated in Wm. Roger Louis, ed., Imperialism: The Robinson and Gallagher Controversy (New York, 1976); George Shepperson, "Ronald Robinson: Scholar and Good Companion," Journal of Imperial and Commonwealth History 16, no. 3 (1988): 1–8.

²⁵ For a critical analysis of the imbrication of liberalism with empire, see Andrew Sartori, "The British Empire and Its Liberal Mission," Journal of Modern History 78, no. 3 (2006): 623–642.

²⁶ Ali Mirsepassi, Amrita Basu, and Frederick Weaver, eds., Localizing Knowledge in a Globalizing World: Recasting the Area Studies Debate (Syracuse, N.Y., 2003), tracks the shift from funding and scholarship in area studies to global or international studies and its close relationship to the United States' geopolitical aims.

liberal approach taken by the United States, which professed anti-imperial ambitions as it simultaneously provided economic and military aid to various areas of the world. Robinson, Gallagher, and Denny (who was American) were wary of U.S. foreign aid that was offered in the hope that it would promote democracy among people living under undemocratic regimes. These canonical historical arguments about empire were a form of political critique in the early 1960s, written in response to the political imperative of witnessing the rise of a “new empire” (the United States) by those who hoped to learn from the lessons of the “old” one (the United Kingdom).²⁷

Over the years, the “Expansion of Europe” course at Cambridge has been significantly revised, and it is no longer as focused on Britain and Europe as it used to be. In 2009 it was renamed “Empires and World History from the Fifteenth Century to the First World War,” and the content was modified to cover world (rather than extra-European) history from a global perspective. It incorporates the study of different empires in order to fill the gap that Carr diagnosed: there are units on the Ottomans, the Qing, imperial Japan, and Russia.

As part of this shift in pedagogy, multiple and overlapping empires are presented as having existed simultaneously and having competed with one another from the early modern period onward. The revised course complicates the image of European expansion by thinking in global and transnational terms and promises to be more inclusive, more capacious, and, as Antoinette Burton frames it, a potential way of “getting outside the global,” away from a Eurocentric focus.²⁸

This is not your father’s world history—a field that was widely excoriated a generation ago for its universalist presumptions about historical progress emanating from Europe. This “new” world history is increasingly shaped by our urgent need to understand and historicize our own globalized condition from the perspective of many locals.²⁹ As in much current writing on globalization, the new global/imperial history presumes a de-centered narrative in which there was no one driving force but rather multiple and unmanageable systems, processes, imaginaries, and contingent events that pushed a diversity of nations, empires, and communities, and their subjects, in different directions.³⁰ The impulse behind this newest iteration of world history offers agency, subjectivity, and history to those who participated in a global

²⁷ Louis, “Introduction,” 40. For a recent exposition of America’s experiments with empire during the Cold War, see Charles S. Maier, Among Empires: American Ascendancy and Its Predecessors (Cambridge, 2006), pt. 2: “America’s Turn,” 141–284.

²⁸ Two versions of an essay by Antoinette Burton offer a way to break out of the dominance of history produced from Europe and the United States: “Getting Outside of the Global: Repositioning British Imperialism in World History,” in Burton, Empire in Question, 275–292; and “Getting Outside the Global: Re-positioning British Imperialism in World History,” in Catherine Hall and Keith McClelland, eds., Race, Nation and Empire: Making Histories, 1750 to the Present (Manchester, 2010), 199–216. See also Two, Three, Many Worlds: Radical Methodologies for Global History, Special Issue, Radical History Review 91 (Winter 2005).

²⁹ See Tony Ballantyne and Antoinette Burton, “Bodies, Empires, and World Histories,” in Ballantyne and Burton, eds., Bodies in Contact: Rethinking Colonial Encounters in World History (Durham, N.C., 2005), 1–15; A. G. Hopkins, ed., Global History: Interactions between the Universal and the Local (New York, 2006); C. A. Bayly and Isabel Hofmeyr’s remarks in “AHR Conversation: On Transnational History,” American Historical Review 115, no. 5 (December 2006): 1441–1464; Michael Geyer and Charles Bright, “World History in a Global Age,” American Historical Review 100, no. 4 (October 1995): 1034–1060; Kevin Grant, Philippa Levine, and Frank Trentmann, Beyond Sovereignty: Britain, Empire and Transnationalism, c. 1889–1950 (New York, 2007).

³⁰ Michael Hardt and Antonio Negri’s Empire (Cambridge, Mass., 2000) and Multitude: War and Democracy in the Age of Empire (New York, 2004) constitute an imaginary for a new global order; for economy and ecumene, and it fundamentally destabilizes the longstanding binaries of subjection and dominance in a range of historiographies between metropole and colony, core and periphery, and, perhaps most important, Europe and non-Europe.

Jane Burbank and Frederick Cooper's Empires in World History and John Darwin's After Tamerlane urge us to compare empires within a larger time and spatial frame than the nineteenth and twentieth centuries so that the history of Europe's colonization of the rest of the world does not stand in for all of imperial history.³¹ In the opening pages of their weighty volume, Burbank and Cooper provide a reason for their expansive treatment of colonial history, offering a numerical comparison: "Whatever was new or old about European colonialism in the nineteenth century, it was, from a historical perspective, short-lived: compare roughly seventy years of colonial rule over Africa to the Ottoman empire's six-hundred-year life span."³² The "seventy versus six hundred" invites numerous counterexamples, which might be too easy a response given the volume's ambitious scope.³³

Darwin goes beyond the exemplary statistic and compares the longevity of different empires to index their impact. When he asks, "But if empire is 'normal,' why has its practice by Europeans aroused such passionate hostility—a hostility still strongly reflected in most of what is written about the subject?" he situates European empires alongside a panoply of other empires and argues that empire is a structure of our collective history.³⁴ When Tamerlane's empire ended in 1405 after three centuries of Timurid rule, a competition was unleashed between Asian and European empires in which the dominance of the latter was temporally limited to about a hundred years. In contrast to Britain, whose empire devolved quickly after World War II, Darwin reminds us of the comparative "success" of the Qing's nearly three centuries of rule. Even though the Qing were supplanted in 1912, their territories conform to those of modern China.³⁵ These numerical comparisons help to situate particular histories of empire, but they raise the question of whether the impact of empire can or should be quantified in numerical terms.³⁶

Somewhat narrower in chronology than Darwin or Burbank and Cooper, but in the tradition of thinking globally and imperially, is C. A. Bayly's Birth of the Modern World, 1780–1914. Through chapters in which he tracks conjunctures between a dizzying range of territories, Bayly shows that the global spread of major modern developments such as industrialization, technology, the study of religion, liberalisms, racialisms, and the classification of social hierarchies was a product of a global mod-criticisms, one might see Julian Bourg, "Empire versus Multitude: Place Your Bets," Ethics and International Affairs 18, no. 3 (2004): 97–107.

³¹ Jane Burbank and Frederick Cooper, Empires in World History: Power and the Politics of Difference (Princeton, N.J., 2010); Darwin, After Tamerlane.

³² Burbank and Cooper, Empires in World History, 21.

³³ Although Germany had only a brief history of colonial activities, scholars have long used it to explain the country's trajectory toward state-sponsored racism in the twentieth century. Hannah Arendt, The Origins of Totalitarianism (London, 1951); Eric Ames, Marcia Klotz, and Lora Wildenthal, eds., Germany's Colonial Pasts (Lincoln, Neb., 2005); Shelley Baranowski, Nazi Empire: German Colonialism and Imperialism from Bismarck to Hitler (Cambridge, 2011); Lora Wildenthal, German Women for Empire, 1884–1945 (Durham, N.C., 2001), especially chap. 5.

³⁴ Darwin, After Tamerlane, 23.

³⁵ Ibid., 496.

³⁶ A. G. Hopkins, "Accounting for the British Empire," Journal of Imperial and Commonwealth History 16, no. 2 (1988): 234–247.

ern in the nineteenth century, one that was generated as much by what occurred in non-European parts of the world as by events in Europe proper.³⁷ Bayly explains the emergence of modernity as a global process rather than one that emanated uniquely from Europe, a shift in emphasis that grants the force of historical change not only to the center (Europe) but to the margins (non-Europe).³⁸

By stressing the need for connections beyond the empires of Europe, Bayly, Burbank and Cooper, and Darwin offer the possibility that global historical change emerged from non-Western and formerly colonized territories whose histories were outside the narrative of the "expansion of Europe." This new global history minimizes the importance of modern European colonialisms over a long chronology and across the globe. A global history built from imperial history thereby edges away from the presumption that studying the impact of European colonialism on culture, subjectivity, and history is crucial to understanding the modern world; rather, it presents empires in general as constitutive of modernity. In the move from imperial to global history, the question of that impact seems less important than it once was, even in the past work of Bayly, Burbank and Cooper, and Darwin.³⁹

The following titles explicitly examine the connections between British imperial history and global history while keeping the structural forces of empire in play as they rely on postcolonial and cultural forms of analysis to read sources and human subjects.⁴⁰ These books are not explicitly comparative, but they share a commitment to thinking of imperial networks as an important vehicle for circulating, mobilizing, and subverting the effects of European colonialisms and hegemonies. In their more modest frames, they convey a sense of why the "imperial" matters, and they suggest how an imperial turn might resist the temptation to go global. This is by no means a

³⁷ C. A. Bayly, The Birth of the Modern World, 1780–1914: Global Connections and Comparisons (Malden, Mass., 2004); see especially chaps. 1, 2, 5, and 7–11.

³⁸ See the responses to Bayly's book in Victorian Studies 48, no. 1 (2005): Jan Nederveen Pieterse, "The Long Nineteenth Century Is Too Short," 113–123; Gauri Viswanathan, "The State of the World," 124–133; C. A. Bayly, "Reply," 134–145.

³⁹ C. A. Bayly is the author of the influential monographs Rulers, Townsmen and Bazaars: North Indian Society in the Age of British Expansion, 1770–1870 (Cambridge, 1983) and Empire and Information: Intelligence Gathering and Social Communication in India, 1780–1870 (Cambridge, 1997). Frederick Cooper is the author of Decolonization and African Society: The Labor Question in French and British Africa (Cambridge, 1996) and Colonialism in Question: Theory, Knowledge, History (Berkeley, Calif., 2005). John Darwin is an expert on African decolonization, having written Britain and Decolonisation: The Retreat from Empire in the Post-War World (New York, 1988); The End of the British Empire: The Historical Debate (Oxford, 1991); and The Empire Project: The Rise and Fall of the British World-System, 1830–1970 (Cambridge, 2009).

⁴⁰ This scholarship breaks apart the metropole/colony dyad to produce other models. For a seminal essay that analyzes "metropole and colony in a single analytic field," see Ann Laura Stoler and Frederick Cooper, "Between Metropole and Colony: Rethinking a Research Agenda," in Cooper and Stoler, eds., Tensions of Empire: Colonial Cultures in a Bourgeois World (Berkeley, Calif., 1997), 1–56. An earlier version appeared in American Ethnologist 16, no. 4 (1989): 609–621. See also Mrinalini Sinha, Colonial Masculinity: The "Manly Englishman" and the "Effeminate Bengali" in the Late Nineteenth Century (Manchester, 1995). Other models for understanding imperial networks that study multiple colonies within a single domain include Tony Ballantyne, Orientalism and Race: Aryanism in the British Empire (London, 2002); and Philippa Levine, Prostitution, Race, and Politics: Policing Venereal Disease in the British Empire (London, 2003). See also David Lambert and Alan Lester, eds., Colonial Lives across the British Empire: Imperial Career in the Long Nineteenth Century (Cambridge, 2006); Alan Lester, Imperial Networks: Creating Identities in Nineteenth-Century South Africa and Britain (London, 2001); Gary B. Magee and Andrew S. Thompson, eds., Empire and Globalisation: Networks of People, Goods and Capital in the British World, c. 1850–1914 (Cambridge, 2010); Kerry Ward, Networks of Empire: Forced Migration in the Dutch East India Company (Cambridge, 2009).

complete list, but these works are illustrative of the diversity of scholarship being produced at the intersection of world or global history with the imperial turn in British studies.

Sugata Bose's A Hundred Horizons: The Indian Ocean in the Age of Global Empire and Thomas Metcalf's Imperial Connections focus on Indian subjects who worked and traveled across imperial sites in the Indian Ocean, from East Africa to Southeast Asia. In Bose's account, Indians such as Rabindranath Tagore sought pan-Asian connections that existed beyond and in spite of the hegemony of the British Empire.⁴¹ In Metcalf's account, the nineteenth-century Indian Ocean can be understood through a study of British colonial subjects and territories throughout the region, as Indian soldiers, officials, and migrant workers spread imperial ideas, practices, and structures across an oceanic expanse even as they began to articulate nationalist and anti-colonial aims.⁴² Bose and Metcalf work from India outward, examining how the British Empire's reach was both contested and consolidated by the mobility of subjects from the Indian subcontinent.

Others have shown how empire produced historical subjectivities that complicate the divide between colonizers and colonized. Clare Anderson's study of convicts and other subalterns across the Indian Ocean demonstrates how widespread and deep were the effects on non-elites of Europe's colonial activities and territorial contests.⁴³ Linda Colley argues in her biographical narrative of the life of Elizabeth Marsh that those who were considered colonizers lived unstable, unpredictable lives. Marsh is a kind of accidental tourist, both a heroine and a victim, and her relationship to Britain and its empire, however tenuous, is reinforced through her travel across imperial circuits.⁴⁴ Emma Rothschild's The Inner Life of Empires uses the history of an imperial merchant family to convey an understanding of the history of eighteenth-century globalization, examining the family's conflicting attitudes toward slavery, capital, and the rapid fluctuations in their global fortunes. Rothschild shows how the lives of elite British families were entangled with the lives of subalterns, such as Belinda, a servant/slave whose subjectivity is framed by the changes in the family's colonial fortunes.⁴⁵ In the spirit of a more inclusive world history, these monographs have subjects whose emotions, sentiments, lifeworlds, and sexualities are part of a complex narrative that is embedded within family structures and economic systems that were produced by colonialism and colonial activities.⁴⁶

The global history of Anderson, Bose, Colley, Metcalf, and Rothschild is no-

⁴¹ Sugata Bose, A Hundred Horizons: The Indian Ocean in the Age of Global Empire (Cambridge, Mass., 2006). See also Rustom Bharucha, Another Asia: Rabindranath Tagore and Okakura Tenshin (New Delhi, 2006).

⁴² Thomas R. Metcalf, Imperial Connections: India in the Indian Ocean Arena, 1860–1920 (Berkeley, Calif., 2007).

⁴³ Clare Anderson, Legible Bodies: Race, Criminality and Colonialism in South Asia (New York, 2004); Anderson, Subaltern Lives: Biographies of Colonialism in the Indian Ocean World, 1790–1920 (Cambridge, 2012). I am very grateful to Clare Anderson for sharing the latter manuscript with me in advance of publication.

⁴⁴ Linda Colley, The Ordeal of Elizabeth Marsh: A Woman in World History (New York, 2007); see also Maya Jasanoff, Liberty's Exiles: American Loyalists in the Revolutionary World (New York, 2011), which was published as this piece was being revised.

⁴⁵ Emma Rothschild, The Inner Life of Empires: An Eighteenth-Century History (Princeton, N.J., 2011). I am very grateful to Emma Rothschild for sharing the manuscript with me in advance of publication.

⁴⁶ See Ballantyne and Burton, Bodies in Contact; Tony Ballantyne and Antoinette Burton, eds.,

ticeably “microhistorical” rather than “world-historical,” following individuals across different regions, colonies, and national imaginings. By working at a smaller scale of world history, Anderson, Colley, and Rothschild are able to situate questions of gender, culture, race, mobility, and subjectivity more centrally. This method—evocative of a desire on the part of feminist and subaltern historians to recuperate the subjectivity of those who are less visible—enables these scholars to conduct archival and prosopographical research that is mindful of structures within empire and the subjects who were produced by empire.⁴⁷

As one arm of an imperial turn, this scholarship is at methodological cross-purposes with the above-cited work of Bayly, Burbank and Cooper, and Darwin. Both groups of historians are working to destabilize Europe as the source of historical change, but rather than “de-centering empire,” Bose, Metcalf, Anderson, Colley, and Rothschild “re-center empire” and reinstate British colonialism as the dominant force in shaping individual subjectivities.⁴⁸ They keep the hegemonies of modern European colonialism in play as a part of global history; in the process, they offer a critique of the overlapping histories of globalization and colonialism and gesture to the costs of disaggregating the two.

The imperial/global turn presumes that empires were a product of global history rather than a driver of it, and that modern empires are an effect of global capitalism rather than an institutional or cultural project specific to the colonizers. The idea of privileging capital over colonialism has had a resurgence in recent years, particularly in thinking about how to historicize globalization.⁴⁹ In “Historicizing the Global, Politicizing Capital: Giving the Present a Name,” Geoff Eley expresses optimism that with “Europe” no longer dominating the academy, we might now be able to move away from a Europe-centered narrative that emanates from wage labor and the industrial revolution and begin thinking of how studies of slavery might produce a different historical narrative of capital and colonialism. In response, Antoinette Burton notes the presumptions behind Eley’s periodization of a post-1989 and post-9/11 era of globalization, and Sanjay Subrahmanyam comments on the absence of China and India from Eley’s vision. They argue that such new histories of globalization unintentionally reaffirm the place of Europe as the central point of reference.⁵⁰ When Burton, in a footnote, observes that “the debate about Europe and Moving Subjects: Gender, Mobility, and Intimacy in an Age of Global Empire (Urbana, Ill., 2009); and Bonnie Smith, ed., Women’s History in Global Perspective, 3 vols. (Urbana, Ill., 2004–2005).

⁴⁷ Conversations with Emma Rothschild and a workshop organized by Clare Anderson at the University of Warwick have enabled me to think this point through more clearly; notably, both cite Carlo Ginzburg as an important influence.

⁴⁸ Durba Ghosh and Dane Kennedy, eds., Decentring Empire: Britain, India, and the Transcolonial World (Hyderabad, 2006).

⁴⁹ P. J. Cain and A. G. Hopkins, British Imperialism: Innovation and Expansion, 1688–1914 (London, 1993); Shigeru Akita, ed., Gentlemanly Capitalism, Imperialism, and Global History (Basingstoke, 2002); Magee and Thompson, Empire and Globalisation; Darwin, The Empire Project. Two works that examine the overlapping relations between capitalist and colonial discursive transformations are Ritu Birla, Stages of Capital: Law, Culture, and Market Governance in Late Colonial India (Durham, N.C., 2009); and Manu Goswami, Producing India: From Colonial Economy to National Space (Chicago, 2004).

⁵⁰ Geoff Eley, “Historicizing the Global, Politicizing Capital: Giving the Present a Name,” History Workshop Journal 63, no. 1 (2007): 154–188; Antoinette Burton, “Not Even Remotely Global? Method and Scale in World History,” History Workshop Journal 64, no. 1 (2007): 323–328; Sanjay Subrahmanyam, “Historicizing the Global, or Labouring for Invention?,” ibid., 329–334.

postcolonialism may yet find its most fertile ground in discussions about globalization and global history," she reminds us that postcolonial critique should not be jettisoned in the imperial turn toward global history.⁵¹

For historians who work within global historical frames, balancing the histories of the parts of the world that were once colonized against the histories of those that did the colonizing is a daunting project that requires ongoing revision. As Micol Seigel trenchantly points out, it is hard to escape the constraints of a Europe-focused narrative. She despairs that postcolonial critics may have insufficiently theorized the impossibility of overcoming the dominant narratives of world history: "Dipesh Chakrabarty urges scholars to listen for histories outside the logic of capital, while Ashis Nandy supports 'ahistorical' constructions of the past, Ranajit Guha resists 'Reason,' and Walter Dignolo calls for macronarratives that begin from Aníbal Quijano's concept of coloniality . . . History's affinity for narratives makes these approaches difficult."⁵²

THE INTERSECTION BETWEEN THE imperial turn and postcolonial studies has not always been a smooth one. Among some historians, postcolonial studies has gained a reputation for being insufficiently careful about historical facts, empiricism, and archives. In conjunction with feminist, queer, and Subaltern Studies, however, it offers important methodological strategies for conducting archival research, particularly when it comes to understanding the productive place of exceptions, margins, secrets, and anxieties in solidifying colonial regimes.

According to various genealogical accounts, postcolonial theory (and studies) draws from fields as diverse as literary criticism, poststructuralism, Subaltern Studies, feminist historiography, and anthropology. From the generative work of Frantz Fanon, C. L. R. James, and Aimé Césaire in the middle of the twentieth century to the work of scholars such as Edward Said, Homi Bhabha, Gayatri Spivak, and Walter Dignolo near the end of the century, the field of postcolonialism has positioned itself as critical of European colonialism and its role in producing scholarship that depicts non-Europe as backward, uncivilized, primitive, hypersexualized, and violent.⁵³ Postcolonialism has had a dramatic but uneven influence in the humanities, and some scholars have expressed concern that resistance to colonialism has become marginalized as a side issue.⁵⁴ Indeed, several academics identified by others as "postco-

⁵¹ Burton, "Not Even Remotely Global?," 327. For an opposing view, see Isabel Hofmeyer's remarks in "AHR Conversation: On Transnational History," 1444. See also Revathi Krishnaswamy and John C. Hawley, eds., The Postcolonial and the Global (Minneapolis, 2008).

⁵² Micol Seigel, "World History's Narrative Problem," Hispanic American Historical Review 84, no. 3 (2004): 431–446, here 434.

⁵³ Good introductions include Nicholas B. Dirks, Geoff Eley, and Sherry B. Ortner, eds., Culture/Power/History: A Reader in Contemporary Social Theory (Princeton, N.J., 1994); Leela Gandhi, Postcolonial Theory: A Critical Introduction (New York, 1998); Henry Schwarz and Sangeeta Ray, A Companion to Postcolonial Studies (Oxford, 2000); Patrick Williams and Laura Chrisman, eds., Colonial Discourse and Post-Colonial Theory: A Reader (New York, 1994); Robert J. C. Young, Postcolonialism: An Historical Introduction (Oxford, 2001).

⁵⁴ Kalpana Seshadri-Crooks, "At the Margins of Postcolonial Studies: Part 1," in Fawzia Afzal-Khan and Kalpana Seshadri-Crooks, eds., The Pre-occupation of Postcolonial Studies (Durham, N.C., 2000), 3–23. The questioning among practitioners dates to much earlier: Anne McClintock, "The Angel of Progress: Pitfalls of the Term 'Post-Colonialism,'" Third World and Postcolonial Issues, Special Issue,

lonial scholars" have expressed some nervousness about what being postcolonial means. They suggest that it may be time to move beyond the colonial and imagine new scholarship that is fully decoupled from Europe's centrality to definitions of "colonial," in terms both of governance and of the production of knowledge.⁵⁵ Although some historians are reluctant to admit to sharing ground with "theorists" of any stripe, postcolonial theorists and traditionally defined imperial historians do have a goal in common: both groups are working to decolonize scholarship by moving away from the grand narratives of "Europe." One might note that global historians such as Bayly, Burbank and Cooper, and Darwin share this ambition as well, although they rely on a different scholarly apparatus.

By 1996, according to Dane Kennedy, postcolonial theory in its many forms had already transformed literature departments, but it had done little to shake the edifice of "imperial history" as it was practiced in Britain or in journals such as the Journal of Imperial and Commonwealth History.⁵⁶ Kennedy proposed a collaborative intersection between postcolonial studies and imperial history, bringing cultural history and discourse analysis together with empirical research on empires. His plea was heeded by some historians and roundly dismissed by others.⁵⁷

The "family quarrel" between British imperial history and postcolonial studies was brought out into the open when the five-volume Oxford History of the British Empire was published in 1998–1999. Many reviewers noted the scant attention it gave to postcolonial scholarship or historical methods that relied on methods of analysis drawn from feminism, Subaltern Studies, critical race theory, or cultural history more broadly.⁵⁸ David Armitage, one of the contributors to the volume on the eighteenth century, noted that the volume on historiography was representative of "imperial historiography in its pre-postcolonial mode," and that it "celebrated Gibbon, Macaulay, and Seeley as the precursors of the field. Throughout, Sir Keith Hancock, Social Text, no. 31/32 (1992): 84–98; Ella Shohat, "Notes on the 'Postcolonial,'" ibid., 99–113; Arif Dirlik, "The Postcolonial Aura: Third World Criticism in the Age of Global Capitalism," Critical Inquiry 20, no. 2 (1994): 328–356; Aijaz Ahmad, In Theory: Classes, Nations, Literatures (London, 1992).

⁵⁵ See Loomba, Kaul, Bunzl, Burton, and Esty, "Beyond What? An Introduction."

⁵⁶ Dane Kennedy, "Imperial History and Postcolonial Theory," Journal of Imperial and Commonwealth History 24, no. 3 (1996): 345–363; see also Antoinette Burton, "Thinking beyond the Boundaries: Empire, Feminism and the Domains of History," Social History 26, no. 1 (2001): 60–71; Mrinalini Sinha, "Historia Nervosa or Who's Afraid of Colonial-Discourse Analysis?" Journal of Victorian Culture 2, no. 1 (1997): 113–122; Wolfe, "History and Imperialism."

⁵⁷ For recent claims that postcolonial studies has lost its importance in imperial history, see, for instance, Matthew Connelly, "The New Imperialists," in Craig Calhoun, Frederick Cooper, and Kevin W. Moore, eds., Lessons of Empire: Imperial Histories and American Power (New York, 2006), 19–33, here 21; Sanjay Subrahmanyam, "Imperial and Colonial Encounters: Some Comparative Reflections," ibid., 217–228, here 222, 225, 226. See also Connelly's remarks in "AHR Conversation: On Transnational History," 1450–1454.

⁵⁸ Antoinette Burton, review of Andrew Porter, ed., The Oxford History of the British Empire, vol. 3: The Nineteenth Century (Oxford, 1999), and Winks, The Oxford History of the British Empire, vol. 5: Historiography, Victorian Studies 44, no. 1 (2001): 167–169; Alison Games, review of Nicholas Canny, ed., The Oxford History of the British Empire, vol. 1: The Origins of Empire: British Overseas Enterprise to the Close of the Seventeenth Century (Oxford, 1998), and Peter J. Marshall, ed., The Oxford History of the British Empire, vol. 2: The Eighteenth Century (Oxford, 1998), Reviews in American History 28, no. 3 (2000): 341–350; Howe, "The Slow Death and Strange Rebirths of Imperial History"; Dane Kennedy, "The Boundaries of Oxford's Empire," International History Review 23, no. 3 (2001): 604–622; Douglas M. Peers, "Is Humpty-Dumpty Back Together Again? The Revival of Imperial History and the Oxford History of the British Empire," Journal of World History 13, no. 2 (2002): 451–467, especially 464–466.

Sir Reginald Coupland, Ronald Robinson, and Jack Gallagher are the most frequently cited giants of imperial history. Almost as often, Antonio Gramsci, Michel Foucault, and Edward Said appear to be its most menacing nemeses.”⁵⁹

The Oxford History emphasized the grand narratives of empire, focusing on political, economic, and military history, with chapters defined by colonial territories such as Asia, Africa, Latin America, the Caribbean, and the Antipodes; the volumes on the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries focused on Ireland and the thirteen colonies. The organization and choice of topics seemed to suggest that traditionally defined (old) imperial historians wanted no part of newfangled historiographical innovations. A chapter in the historiography volume, “Disease, Diet, and Gender: Late Twentieth-Century Perspectives on Empire,” lumped together recent historical turns toward science, gender, and domestic consumption on the assumption that they would be fleeting concerns in comparison with the longstanding history of imperial history in Britain that started with Seeley.⁶⁰

Most important, the Oxford History projected an air of scholarly detachment in favor of a long-established tradition of British imperial history. As Wm. Roger Louis noted with a tone of finality in the foreword that appeared in all five volumes, “Though the subject remains ideologically charged, the passions aroused by British imperialism have so lessened that we are now better placed than ever before to see the course of the Empire steadily and to see it whole.”⁶¹ Louis did not explain whose “passions” were “aroused” or who the “we” were who were “better placed . . . to see the course of the Empire steadily,” but if the five weighty volumes were intended to be definitive or comprehensive, they instead generated more revisions.⁶²

The subsequent declaration of a “new imperial history” drew in substantial ways on the dissatisfaction with the original volumes of The Oxford History of the British Empire. In Kathleen Wilson’s definition, the new imperial history focused more on cultures of empire and on language, and was dependent on poststructuralist ideas in which discourses, narratives, and representations were as important as material “realities.”⁶³ It distinguished itself from the “old” imperial history by putting less

⁵⁹ David Armitage, review of Winks, The Oxford History of the British Empire, vol. 5: Historiography, Economic History Review, n.s., 54, no. 1 (2001): 195–196.

⁶⁰ Diana Wylie, “Disease, Diet, and Gender: Late Twentieth-Century Perspectives on Empire,” in Winks, The Oxford History of the British Empire, 5: 277–289; Louis, “Introduction,” ibid., 1–42.

⁶¹ Wm. Roger Louis, “Foreword,” in The Oxford History of the British Empire, all five volumes, vi–viii, here vii; see also Darwin, After Tamerlane, 23–25; and Felipe Fernández-Armesto, “Imperial Measures: Grand Delusions in Defining the Dominators of the World,” Times Literary Supplement, September 24, 2010, 8–9.

⁶² The editors subsequently commissioned a companion series to examine issues that had not been fully addressed in the chronologically organized volumes. William Beinart and Lotte Hughes, eds., Environment and Empire (Oxford, 2007); Robert Bickers, ed., Settlers and Expatriates: Britons over the Seas (Oxford, 2010); Phillip Buckner, ed., Canada and the British Empire (Oxford, 2008); Marjory Harper and Stephen Constantine, Migration and Empire (Oxford, 2010); Kevin Kenny, ed., Ireland and the British Empire (Oxford, 2004); Levine, Gender and Empire; Philip D. Morgan and Sean Hawkins, eds., Black Experience and the Empire (Oxford, 2004); Deryck M. Schreuder and Stuart Ward, eds., Australia’s Empire (Oxford, 2008).

⁶³ Wilson, “Introduction: Histories, Empires, Modernities”; see also Catherine Hall and Sonya Rose, “Introduction: Being at Home with the Empire,” in Hall and Rose, eds., At Home with the Empire: Metropolitan Culture and the Imperial World (Cambridge, 2006), 1–31; Hall, “Introduction: Thinking the Postcolonial, Thinking the Empire”; Howe, “Introduction: New Imperial Histories”; Kathleen Wilson, “Old Imperialisms and New Imperial Histories: Rethinking the History of the Present,” Radical History Review 95 (2006): 211–234.

emphasis on the role played by trade, commerce, warfare, and treaties in bringing about an imperial world. By moving away from the well-known big questions about the British Empire, the new imperial history reframed the scholarship through a new focus on subaltern, minority, feminist, and postcolonial perspectives. This dovetailed with the views of historians who were working from the perspective of Britain's colonies, particularly those associated with the Subaltern Studies Collective, a group of scholars of South Asia that was formed in the mid-1970s. For those in the subaltern school and in the new imperial history, writing "small" history or the history of many fragments has become an important way to challenge older imperial histories that claimed to be comprehensive.⁶⁴

A brief detour through some of the scholarship that was inspired by the Subaltern Studies Collective can show how it relates to imperial history in Britain.⁶⁵ Although scholars influenced by Subaltern Studies and the new imperial history share a commitment to making the story of marginal subjects more prominent in explaining the emergence of dominant and hegemonic practices, they have distinct goals and distinct audiences. Those who work from within the new British imperial history have argued forcefully that empire mattered greatly to Britons and was constitutive of Britain's domestic history. This interest in challenging the domestic parochialisms of British historiography was not shared by Subaltern Studies scholars, whose audience was initially other South Asianists in India and elsewhere.

The members of the Subaltern Studies Collective initially defined themselves against histories of South Asia written from "colonialist" and "nationalist" perspectives. They rejected the "bourgeois-elitist" perspective of the dominant narratives of history-writing and those works' exclusive focus on the political history of colonial officials and nationalist leaders; instead, they urged a turn toward the "non-elite" and the "subaltern."⁶⁶ The collective is often described as having taken a postcolonial turn in the mid-1980s when the historian Ranajit Guha and the literary critic Gayatri Spivak collaborated to produce a reader of important articles from the first six volumes of Subaltern Studies.⁶⁷ Scholars who were critical of the collective's approaches decried the fading importance of Marxist approaches to history in preference to poststructuralist strategies and questioned whether "Europe" had become a more ⁶⁴ In "A Small History of Subaltern Studies," Dipesh Chakrabarty writes that Subaltern Studies was imagined as histories that "privilege the idea of the fragment over that of the whole or totality"; in Chakrabarty, Habitations of Modernity: Essays in the Wake of Subaltern Studies (Chicago, 2002), 3–19, here 18, citing Gyanendra Pandey, "In Defense of the Fragment: Writing about Hindu-Muslim Riots in India Today," Representations 37 (Winter 1992): 27–55; Partha Chatterjee, The Nation and Its Fragments: Colonial and Postcolonial Histories (Princeton, N.J., 1993); and Shahid Amin, Event, Metaphor, Memory: Chauri Chaura, 1922–1992 (Berkeley, Calif., 1995). See also Madhavi Kale, Fragments of Empire: Capital, Slavery, and Indian Indentured Labor in the British Caribbean (Philadelphia, 1998); Ranajit Guha, The Small Voice of History: Collected Essays, ed. Partha Chatterjee (Ranikhet, 2009).

⁶⁵ The collective's interventions reached historians in other fields. See the contributions to the AHR Forum in American Historical Review 99, no. 5 (December 1994): Gyan Prakash, "Subaltern Studies as Postcolonial Criticism," 1475–1490; Florencia E. Mallon, "The Promise and Dilemma of Subaltern Studies: Perspectives from Latin American History," 1491–1515; and Frederick Cooper, "Conflict and Connection: Rethinking Colonial African History," 1516–1545. The collective's last publication appeared in 2005, and a workshop at Princeton University titled "After Subaltern Studies: Early Career South Asian Studies" was held during the Princeton South Asian Studies Conference, April 27–28, 2012.

⁶⁶ See Ranajit Guha's modestly titled manifesto "On Some Aspects of Historiography of Colonial India," in Guha, ed., Subaltern Studies I (New Delhi, 1982), 1–8.

⁶⁷ Ranajit Guha and Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak, eds., Selected Subaltern Studies (New York, 1988).

central concern than the agency and subjectivity of subalterns themselves, and whether the global success of the scholars who were part of the collective had muted some of the radical interventions that the group championed.⁶⁸ Scholars speak of “early” and “late” Subaltern Studies, with the two collections of selected essays from the edited volumes marking the shift from the study of Indian peasants, workers, and non-elites to the construction of colonial forms of knowledge, particularly archival knowledge.⁶⁹ But the “early” and the “late” were not fully closed off from one another; indeed, it was through the careful reading of archival fragments and vernacular sources and the close parsing of texts that members of the collective demonstrated how scholars could use literary analysis to inscribe fragments of subaltern consciousness where one might have presumed that there was little evidence of subaltern activity or action.⁷⁰ Although social historians were anxious about the loss of subaltern voice, agency, and consciousness that might come with a postcolonial turn, the collective’s engagements with postcolonial studies offered the possibility that “voices from below” might be recuperated and recast outside a frame of liberal historiography that was defined by disciplinary norms proposed by European colonizers.⁷¹

Anxieties about the influence of these other turns—cultural, postcolonial, linguistic—were shared among those who were critical of the historical methods proposed by the Subaltern Studies Collective and by the interventions of the new imperial history. In recent years, some historians of empire have initiated a new turn, arguing that the linguistic and cultural turns in its postcolonial avatar were ahistorical, indifferent to historical change, and prone to “story plucking,” “time flattening,” and “leapfrogging” in narrating historical events.⁷² The challenge to an imperial/postcolonial turn and its reliance on discursive analysis came from scholars whose work remained resolutely autonomous, self-consciously based in “empirical” evidence. In this body of work, there are frequent calls to return to demonstrable “facts,” such as the economy, trade deficits, and import-export balances.⁷³

⁶⁸ See Ramachandra Guha, “Subaltern and Bhadrakal Studies,” Economic and Political Weekly 30, no. 33 (August 19, 1995): 2056–2058; Jim Masselos, “The Dis/Appearance of Subalterns: A Reading of a Decade of Subaltern Studies,” South Asia, n.s., 15, no. 1 (1992): 105–125; Tirthankar Roy, “Subaltern Studies: Questioning the Basics,” Economic and Political Weekly 37, no. 23 (June 8, 2002): 2223–2228; K. Sivaramakrishnan, “Situating the Subaltern: History and Anthropology in the Subaltern Studies Project,” Journal of Historical Sociology 8, no. 4 (December 1995): 395–429; David Washbrook, “Orientalism and Occidents: Colonial Discourse Theory and the Historiography of the British Empire,” in Winks, The Oxford History of the British Empire, 5: 596–611.

⁶⁹ The terms “early” and “late” are used by Tirthankar Roy, “Questioning the Basics”; Chakrabarty, “A Small History of Subaltern Studies”; Ranajit Guha, ed., A Subaltern Studies Reader, 1986–1995 (Minneapolis, 1997).

⁷⁰ Two essays exemplify a historical method that is attentive to popular and community discourses and subjectivities: Ranajit Guha, “Chandra’s Death,” in Guha, ed., Subaltern Studies V (Delhi, 1987), 135–165; and Shahid Amin, “Gandhi as Mahatma: Gorakhpur District, Eastern UP, 1921–22,” in Guha, ed., Subaltern Studies III (Delhi, 1984), 1–61.

⁷¹ Among the critical essays are Sumit Sarkar, “The Decline of the Subaltern in Subaltern Studies,” in Sarkar, Writing Social History (Delhi, 1997), 82–108; Rosalind O’Hanlon and David Washbrook, “After Orientalism: Culture, Criticism, and Politics in the Third World,” Comparative Studies in Society and History 34, no. 1 (January 1992): 141–167. Responses include Gyan Prakash, “Can the ‘Subaltern’ Ride? A Reply to O’Hanlon and Washbrook,” ibid., 168–184; and Dipesh Chakrabarty, “Radical Histories and Question of Enlightenment Rationalism: Some Recent Critiques of Subaltern Studies,” Economic and Political Weekly 30, no. 14 (April 8, 1995): 751–759. The essays are reprinted in Vinayak Chaturvedi, ed., Mapping Subaltern Studies and the Postcolonial (New York, 2000).

⁷² Cooper, Colonialism in Question, 17–19.

⁷³ For instance, Andrew S. Thompson attempts to measure the impact of the empire on different

In 2006, Richard Price announced: "The imperial turn is unlikely to suffer the same fate as the linguistic turn."⁷⁴ He distanced the imperial turn from the excesses of the linguistic turn and its professed attachment to literary criticism, continental theory, and postcolonial criticism and suggested that imperial history was grounded in archival evidence, rigorous argument, and material concerns rather than culture or language.⁷⁵ Price seems to reject Spivak's (Derridean) deconstructionist mode of analysis and Saidian (Foucauldian) discursive analysis to remind us that British history's method is empirical, imperial, and systemic, in contrast to French interventions in history, which are based on "theory." In Price's account, the imperial turn is its own scholarly approach, building on a set of analytic practices with their basis in British universalisms such as free trade, liberalism, possessive individualism, and the rule of law.

This recent critique of the role of postcolonial studies in the imperial turn has inspired a numbers-driven or empirical archival methodology that relegates the interdisciplinary possibilities of postcolonial studies to the sidelines, especially the role of margins or the fragment as a generative source of historical change. One might cite Bernard Porter's ruthlessly empirical Absent-Minded Imperialists, which details how little Britons cared about empire at its height in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Through a meticulous search of textual sources produced in Britain, Porter argues that the presence of empire barely registered in the reading material of a broadly construed reading public, thus challenging the claims of new imperial historians such as Catherine Hall and Kathleen Wilson, who have argued that a widespread imperial culture in Britain produced popular support for colonial expansion.⁷⁶ Porter's book is provocative, and he clearly defines the opposition: postcolonial literary scholars, cultural historians, and others who take a shoddy approach to archival work that is inattentive to numerical evidence.⁷⁷

In response to Porter's work, the literary scholar Lee Sterrenburg generously noted: "Historians often count things; they pay attention to the numbers. We in literary studies and cultural studies often do not keep track of the numbers. But we sometimes write as if we do."⁷⁸ While Sterrenburg presupposes that "we in literary studies" and other non-archivally based fields do not share a concern with archival categories of British citizens in The Empire Strikes Back? The Impact of Imperialism on Britain from the Mid-Nineteenth Century (Harlow, 2005).

⁷⁴ Price, "One Big Thing," 602. According to the Google N-gram chart in James Cook's essay in this forum, 2006 was the year in which the imperial turn spiked.

⁷⁵ Price presumes the prior existence of the linguistic and cultural turn for the production of the imperial turn, but Bill Sewell notes that his own "conversion" as a young faculty member at Chicago was influenced by Bernard Cohn and Ron Inden, anthropologists who worked on India. William H. Sewell, Jr., Logics of History: Social Theory and Social Transformation (Chicago, 2005), 42.

⁷⁶ Bernard Porter, The Absent-Minded Imperialists: Empire, Society, and Culture in Britain (Oxford, 2004); Hall and Rose, At Home with the Empire; Kathleen Wilson, The Island Race: Englishness, Empire and Gender in the Eighteenth Century (London, 2003).

⁷⁷ Critical reviews occasioned an extended response from Bernard Porter, "Further Thoughts about Imperial Absent-Mindedness," Journal of Imperial and Commonwealth History 36, no. 1 (2008): 101–117; and a subsequent response by one of his interlocutors, John Mackenzie, "'Comfort' and Conviction: A Response to Bernard Porter," Journal of Imperial and Commonwealth History 36, no. 4 (2008): 659–668.

⁷⁸ Lee Sterrenburg, "Significant Evidences and the Imperial Archive: Response," Victorian Studies 46, no. 2 (2004): 275–283, here 277. Porter approvingly cited this passage in a response to his critics.

research and empiricism, his image of what historians do effaces the value of studying the margins, those in the minority, and those less numerous.⁷⁹

The question of numbers and “keeping track,” or maintaining an account book of colonialism, invites investigation, particularly if we think of history’s growing distance from the numbers-driven, quantitative turn in political science and some branches of sociology.⁸⁰ Arjun Appadurai’s 2006 book Fear of Small Numbers examines the peculiar importance that small numbers take on in our social anxieties: there may be one terrorist flying on Christmas Day with explosives in his underwear, but he then becomes a cipher for a nationwide lack of trust between a majority and a minority population.⁸¹ Appadurai’s paradigm explains how small numbers can produce disproportionate anxieties; his ratio can also help us understand how historical anxieties produced from the social margins of empire manifest themselves in the texts of colonial archives. (The definition of colonial archives need not be limited to texts; it could easily be expanded to include advertisements, films, posters, museum pieces, and children’s books.)⁸² If archival deficiencies are an obstacle to understanding those who were less important in history, Appadurai’s model transforms the problem of archival material from a situation of lack to one of profusion and proliferation.

Calls for empiricism in the imperial turn have moved us toward an archival turn, something that has received a great deal of attention in colonial studies.⁸³ The charge that some historians are too lazy to visit archives is a standard refrain among those who are unmoved by the interventions of the cultural, linguistic, and imperial turns.⁸⁴ In a study of colonial India that was published in 2000, Richard Eaton noted that a majority of the research on India is conducted in a few archives. “Indeed, the 1980s and 1990s saw a sharp drop from levels of earlier decades in the number of historians who applied for support or permission to conduct research out in the mufassal—that is, in district archives, local libraries, private collections, zamindari records, and so ⁷⁹ On the continuing richness of the margins in imperial history, see Sameetah Agha and Elizabeth Kolsky, eds., Fringes of Empire: Peoples, Places, and Spaces in Colonial India (Delhi, 2009); Harald Fischer-Tiné and Susanne Gehrmann, eds., Empires and Boundaries: Rethinking Race, Class, and Gender in Colonial Settings (New York, 2009).

⁸⁰ See Mirsepassi, Basu, and Weaver, Localizing Knowledge in a Globalizing World, 7–8. Wasserstrom reminds us that statistically driven history never emerged in the way it was once imagined; “New Ways in History,” 282.

⁸¹ Arjun Appadurai, Fear of Small Numbers: An Essay on the Geography of Anger (Durham, N.C., 2006).

⁸² See especially John M. Mackenzie, Propaganda and Empire: The Manipulation of British Public Opinion, 1880–1960 (Manchester, 1984); Mackenzie, ed., Imperialism and Popular Culture (Manchester, 1986); Timothy Burke, Lifebuoy Men, Lux Women: Commodification, Consumption, and Cleanliness in Modern Zimbabwe (Durham, N.C., 1996); Annie E. Coombes, Reinventing Africa: Museums, Material Culture, and Popular Imagination in Late Victorian and Edwardian England (New Haven, Conn., 1994); David Ciarlo, Advertising Empire: Race and Visual Culture in Imperial Germany (Cambridge, Mass., 2011); Anne McClintock, Imperial Leather: Race, Gender, and Sexuality in the Colonial Contest (New York, 1995), chap. 5: “Soft-Soaping Empire: Commodity Racism and Imperial Advertising,” 207–231; Christopher Pinney and Nicolas Peterson, eds., Photography’s Other Histories (Durham, N.C., 2003); James R. Ryan, Picturing Empire: Photography and the Visualization of the British Empire (Chicago, 1997).

⁸³ Antoinette Burton, ed., Archive Stories: Facts, Fictions, and the Writing of History (Durham, N.C., 2005); Burton, Dwelling in the Archive: Women Writing House, Home, and History in Late Colonial India (New York, 2003); Carolyn Hamilton, Verne Harris, Jane Taylor, Michele Pickover, Graeme Reid, and Razia Saleh, eds., Refiguring the Archive (Cape Town, 2002); Thomas Richards, The Imperial Archive: Knowledge and the Fantasy of Empire (London, 1993).

⁸⁴ Howe, “Introduction: New Imperial Histories,” 3.

forth. Most ended up in London, and a few in national or state archives in India, studying colonial records that were then subjected to discourse analysis.”⁸⁵ Eaton suspects that historians of colonialism are getting soft; we used to be hunters and gatherers, “visiting the Indian hinterland,” but now we find ourselves sitting in arm-chairs in America or Britain “theorizing about texts.”⁸⁶ Matthew Connelly has expressed similar dismay about the lack of archival scholarship behind particular kinds of scholarly work: “When I work in the archives of the World Bank or the World Health Organization or the Ford Foundation, I find myself virtually alone (and wondering whether all the professed interest in ‘political economy’ in the cultural studies field is sincere).”⁸⁷ There is a whiff of archival machismo combined with disciplinary gatekeeping in Eaton’s and Connelly’s criticisms, but if historians did indeed welcome literary critics or cultural studies scholars into the archives, would our place in the academy as the hunters of “facts” be undermined?⁸⁸

The centrality of archival research is an important problematic for all historians, but particularly so for those of us who rely on archives that were created by a colonial government. Many of us read “against the grain,” mining the archives for knowledge that no one else has found, producing evidence of lives lived in the past that demonstrates something new and original.⁸⁹ In rejecting the grand narratives of great men and their voluminous archives, much of the historical scholarship “from below” claimed its moral authority (and staked a claim to extreme forms of archival labor and prowess) from a position of absence: there were fewer documents on women, slaves, subalterns, children, and the disabled, and we found them. I am among those who regularly feel archivally superior (and, yes, even macho) because of my ongoing suffering in archives across India, where dust, a lack of air-conditioning, and frequent power outages are obstacles to research.⁹⁰ Against the challenges of archival deficiency, some of us have become archival swashbucklers.

The archival turn can be its own kind of closure, consolidating historians’ access to “facts.” But by examining how the archival turn draws from the imperial/postcolonial turn, and by considering the possibility of another set of imperial turns, we can resist this closure and return to archival research in a new spirit of interdisciplinary engagement and robust empiricism.

Archives are growing in importance to literary scholars, postcolonial critics, and anthropologists who work on European colonialisms. Two recent critical analyses were authored by scholars of literature who are historically minded: Betty Joseph’s

⁸⁵ Richard Eaton, “(Re)imag(in)ing Otherness: A Postmortem for the Postmodern in India,” Journal of World History 11, no. 1 (2000): 57–78, here 73; this sentiment was echoed by Price, “One Big Thing,” 608.

⁸⁶ Eaton, “(Re)imag(in)ing Otherness,” 73.

⁸⁷ “AHR Conversation: On Transnational History,” 1453.

⁸⁸ Carolyn Steedman, Dust: The Archive and Cultural History (New Brunswick, N.J., 2002).

⁸⁹ The idea of “archival fetishism” has been analyzed through a gendered lens by Antoinette Burton, “Archive Stories: Gender in the Making of Imperial and Colonial Histories,” in Levine, Gender and Empire, 281–293.

⁹⁰ See Dinyar Patel’s four-part series on Indian archives and libraries in the New York Times blog India Ink: “In India, History Literally Rots Away,” March 20, 2012; “Repairing the Damage at India’s National Archives,” March 21, 2012; “India’s Archives: How Did Things Get This Bad?,” March 22, 2012; “The Parsis, Once India’s Curators, Now Shrug as History Rots,” March 23, 2012, <http://india.blogs.nytimes.com/author/dinyar-patel/>.

Reading the East India Company and Anjali Arondekar's For the Record.⁹¹ When we read those works alongside Ann Stoler's Along the Archival Grain, which is framed as "an ethnography of the archive," we start to see that how a colonial state maintained its archives makes a great deal of difference to historians' practices.⁹²

Joseph, Arondekar, and to a lesser degree Stoler build on Gayatri Spivak's now decades-old expression of concern with the archives in an essay from 1985, "The Rani of Sirmur: An Essay in Reading the Archives," in which she examined a moment in one woman's life, arguing that it was only when the woman became an object of concern for the colonial state that she was able to be recorded in the archives.⁹³ It was an important seed for Spivak's arguments in "Can the Subaltern Speak?," a canonical text in feminist and postcolonial studies in which she contends that the colonial archive was the voice of the liberal-imperial state and that it should be used with some caution in the quest for subaltern subjectivities.⁹⁴ Spivak's essay challenged one of the key tenets of Ranajit Guha's goal in founding Subaltern Studies, which was to unearth subaltern consciousness that was neither elite nor official; Guha called subaltern subjectivity "autonomous," an idea that was later revised (in conversation with Spivak's intervention) to consider the ways in which the subaltern or insurgent was produced as a historical subject by the colonial archives.⁹⁵

In spite of Spivak's pessimism, the search for the female subaltern has continued. Joseph begins from the proposition that there are silences and gaps in the East India Company's archives that require careful reading. She challenges Spivak's occlusion and erasure of gendered subjects, arguing that "the partial and fragmented appearance of women can provide the occasion for a new telling that ushers in a new subject of history."⁹⁶ Joseph works from the assumption that if one reads carefully, there are silences to be excavated, subjectivities to be retrieved, and patterns of gendered domination to be discovered in the colonial archive.

Stoler and Arondekar go in a different direction, emphasizing the voluminousness of the colonial archive. "The official documents of colonial archives like the Netherlands Indies," Stoler notes, "are so weighted with fixed formats, empty phrases, and racial clichés that one is easily blinded by their flattened prose and numbing dullness."⁹⁷ Archival excess is never fully contained by the logic of the colonial state: in Stoler's detailed ethnography of one archive, she is struck by "how ⁹¹ Betty Joseph, Reading the East India Company, 1720–1840: Colonial Currencies of Gender (Chicago, 2004); Anjali Arondekar, For the Record: On Sexuality and the Colonial Archive in India (Durham, N.C., 2009). Both build on the work of Richards, The Imperial Archive.

⁹² Ann Laura Stoler, Along the Archival Grain: Epistemic Anxieties and Colonial Common Sense (Princeton, N.J., 2009); see also Nicholas B. Dirks, "Annals of the Archive: Ethnographic Notes on the Sources of History," in Brian Keith Axel, ed., From the Margins: Historical Anthropology and Its Futures (Durham, N.C., 2002), 47–65.

⁹³ Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak, "The Rani of Sirmur: An Essay in Reading the Archives," History and Theory 24, no. 3 (1985): 247–272.

⁹⁴ Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak, "Can the Subaltern Speak?," in Cary Nelson and Lawrence Grossberg, eds., Marxism and the Interpretation of Culture (Urbana, Ill., 1988), 271–313.

⁹⁵ Ranajit Guha had anticipated some of Spivak's interventions in "The Prose of Counter-Insurgency," in Guha, ed., Subaltern Studies II (Delhi, 1983), 1–42. The Spivakian turn was most deeply felt in the essays by Gyanendra Pandey, which culminated in The Construction of Communalism in Colonial North India (Delhi, 1990). For an exposition of Subaltern Studies' engagements with their critics, see Chakrabarty, Habitations of Modernity, chaps. 1–2. See also Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak, A Critique of Postcolonial Reason: Toward a History of the Vanishing Present (Cambridge, Mass., 1999), chap. 3.

⁹⁶ Joseph, Reading the East India Company, 3.

⁹⁷ Stoler, Along the Archival Grain, 23.

much of what was collected was made irrelevant to what state officials decided, both to what they acknowledged they could do in practice and what about the Indies they claimed to know.”⁹⁸ Stoler rightly refuses to distinguish between the different values placed on the archive in historical, anthropological, and literary scholarship, noting that “the broader social life of an archive” makes it an important constitutive fact in both culture and history. She demands that the archive be seen not as a bank or a place of “extraction” or excavation, but as constitutive of a larger set of social relations that it can never fully contain.⁹⁹

In the spirit of Stoler’s ethnography, Arondekar asks: “Can an empty archive also be full?” and she examines the process by which sexuality—ordinarily repressed by the colonial state—permeates the archive at multiple levels.¹⁰⁰ Situating herself at the intersection of queer and postcolonial studies, she conducts a close reading of Victorian advertisements and manuals for dildos made of “India rubber,” noting that “late nineteenth-century pornographic texts are plentifully available (albeit in ‘locked cupboards’ and ‘private cases’). Yet such plenitude eschews any simple turn to the rhetorical mystifications of presence and facticity.”¹⁰¹ Arondekar’s challenge to facticity is suggestive of how archival plenitude might be calculated, particularly when it relates to a subject that is rarely the subject of history. Her primary focus is the “open secret” of homosexuality, but one might expand it further to encompass all the other open secrets that are embedded in the archive, but that are uncountable and unaccountable to a singular source of information.

The plentiful archival evidence of marginal populations animates Elizabeth Kolsky’s argument in Colonial Justice in British India. She begins from the study of a population that is often at the margins of colonial society: “poor whites,” who were insufficiently European to join the ruling classes. One might think that a marginal population would not have produced many records, but Kolsky discovered quite the opposite. She found an abundance of court cases documenting the crimes of a marginal population of poor or “mean” whites whose archival presence proliferated in spite of their small numbers. By reading an enormous number of court cases, criminal complaints, legislative documents, and official memoranda, she demonstrates how legal codification in India, imagined as a cornerstone of the putatively rational and emancipatory rule of law that underpinned British rule there, circumvented the liberal claims behind empire.¹⁰² Her arguments build on Giorgio Agamben’s claims about the generative power of exceptions: although codification was intended to promote a rationalized bureaucracy for administering justice, it was based on a large number of exceptions authorizing a colonial rule of difference that became normative.¹⁰³

The idea of a voluminous archive of the margins, exemplified by Stoler’s and Kolsky’s research, rather than one that is hard to access or somehow inadequate to

⁹⁸ Ibid., 29.

⁹⁹ Ibid., 45.

¹⁰⁰ Arondekar, For the Record, 1. See also Ann Laura Stoler, Race and the Education of Desire: Foucault’s “History of Sexuality” and the Colonial Order of Things (Durham, N.C., 1995); Stoler, Carnal Knowledge and Imperial Power: Race and the Intimate in Colonial Rule (Berkeley, Calif., 2002).

¹⁰¹ Arondekar, For the Record, 99.

¹⁰² Elizabeth Kolsky, “Conclusion,” in Kolsky, Colonial Justice in British India (Cambridge, 2010), 229–233.

¹⁰³ Agamben, State of Exception.

the task of writing a well-researched historical monograph or dissertation, is a relatively new idea. Notably, this archival turn originated with scholars whose imperial turn is invested in postcolonial ways of reading, in gender and sexuality studies, and in following the minutiae of court cases, catalogues, and archival indexes. One might be tempted to classify the archival turn as a return to empiricism, as is encouraged by Price, Porter, Eaton, and Connelly, but it is not in the spirit of the arguments that we see in the work of Stoler, Arondekar, and Kolsky. This archival turn relies on strategies of “theorizing about texts,” while doing a lot of gathering at the same time.

ONE STRIKING FEATURE OF THE series of turns that the historiography on empires has taken is the focus on the profusion of information, the spread of knowledge, people, cultures, and practices across networks that are both global and imperial. In the multiplicity of these turns, in the imperial turn’s turn toward globalization, toward postcolonial studies, and toward the archive, there is a great deal of information that is unmanageable by a single actor.

As the other essays in this forum argue, using the language of the “new,” “after,” and “beyond” to describe historiographical turns seems premature. My compressed and selective account of British imperial history since the late nineteenth century to the present might seem parochial, particularly for historians working in other fields in which the coordinates and concerns of imperial turns are quite different. But since 9/11, drawing lessons from the late-nineteenth-century British Empire and applying them to the emergent American empire has become an important theme among historians of empire.¹⁰⁴ If we are to remain critical of colonialism’s new guises, or what Harry Harootunian has suggestively called “the empire’s new clothes,” we must continue to be self-reflexive about our current imperial moment, one that was born of our shared historical legacies and historiographies.¹⁰⁵

¹⁰⁴ Calhoun, Cooper, and Moore, Lessons of Empire; Go, Patterns of Empire; Eric Hobsbawm, On Empire: America, War, and Global Supremacy (New York, 2008); A. G. Hopkins, “Capitalism, Nationalism and the New American Empire,” Journal of Imperial and Commonwealth History 35, no. 1 (2007): 95–117; Hopkins, “Lessons of ‘Civilizing Missions’ Are Mostly Unlearned,” New York Times, March 23, 2003, 5; Stephen Howe, “Afterword: Transnationalisms, Good, Bad, Real, Imagined, Thick and Thin,” Postcolonial Studies and Transnational Resistance, Special Issue, Interventions 4, no. 1 (2002): 79–88; Dane Kennedy, “Essay and Reflection: On the American Empire from a British Imperial Perspective,” International History Review 29, no. 1 (2007): 83–108; Timothy H. Parsons, The Rule of Empires: Those Who Built Them, Those Who Endured Them, and Why They Always Fail (Oxford, 2010). As this essay was going to press, an opinion piece appeared in a major American newspaper: Kwasi Kwarteng, “Echoes of the End of the Raj,” New York Times, April 17, 2012, A25.

¹⁰⁵ Harootunian, The Empire’s New Clothes; see also Sharad Chari and Katherine Verdery, “Thinking between the Posts: Postcolonialism, Postsocialism, and Ethnography after the Cold War,” Comparative Studies in Society and History 51, no. 1 (2009): 6–34.

Durba Ghosh is Associate Professor of History at Cornell University. She is the author of Sex and the Family in Colonial India: The Making of Empire (Cambridge University Press, 2006) and, with Dane Kennedy, co-editor of Decentering Empire: Britain, India and the Transcolonial World (Orient Longman, 2006). She is currently working on a project on revolutionary terrorism and political violence in late colonial Bengal, which focuses on acts of violence against the British colonial state and the colonial government’s responses.

AHR Forum
Comment: Not Yet Far Enough

JULIA ADENEY THOMAS

IN THE SUMMER OF 1984, just as the translation of Jean-François Lyotard's The Postmodern Condition proclaimed that "the status of knowledge is altered as societies enter what is known as the postindustrial age and cultures enter what is known as the postmodern age," an older historian living on the North Carolina coast tried to teach me to surf cast.¹ At one point, despairing of my fishing skills, she steered the conversation to history and said rather wistfully that she longed to transfer all of her knowledge directly to me so that I would be able to carry on where she left off. Much to my retrospective embarrassment, I scoffed. I dismissed even the desirability of such a transfer, declaring, with all the wisdom of one year of graduate school, that the framework of knowledge, the questions posed, and, most of all, the progressive narrative embraced by her generation were passé. Contemporary theory had upended her epistemological assumptions and modes of representation, replacing them with a fierce, self-reflective knowingness about the discursive and contingent character of all practices. This older historian, born in 1899, had combined service in the Roosevelt administration and journalism with historical research, most particularly into the ideas behind the American Revolution with her book George Mason: Constitutionalist, in print since 1938.² History for her, if grasped firmly by right-minded political leaders, could have a teleological drive: progress was possible and cumulative; fascism had been defeated, civil rights promoted, prosperity attained. Likewise, historical knowledge could be progressive and cumulative; more could be added, but both what counted as knowledge and how it should be represented remained self-evident. In her America, the angel of history faced determinedly forward into brightness, leaving the debris behind him. For me, splashing in the waters of the postindustrial, postmodern age, interested in Japan, educated not only after her time but after the intellectual gains and political disappointments of the 1960s and 1970s, after the introduction of Gramscian complications into Marxian paradigms, Foucault's conception of discursive structures, feminism and gender studies, Said's critique of Orientalism, and much else besides, her faith in history seemed the equivalent of Druidic ritual, strangely beautiful in its mysteries but lacking contemporary traction. Plus, I was young and primed for oedipal gestures.

¹ Jean-François Lyotard, The Postmodern Condition: A Report on Knowledge, trans. Geoff Bennington and Brian Massumi (Minneapolis, 1984), 3. I make my brief foray into autobiography fully aware of the contested status of experience as a basis for history and its uncertain alliance with forms of left and feminist historiography. For an excellent discussion, see Martin Jay, Songs of Experience: Modern American and European Variations on a Universal Theme (Berkeley, Calif., 2006).

² Helen Hill Miller, George Mason: Constitutionalist (New York, 1938). The structure of Miller's experience gave plausibility to her liberal New Deal optimism as well as to the optimism of later social historians as part of what William Sewell describes as "the great worldwide postwar capitalist boom. So-called 'Fordist' or state-centered capitalism, with its fundamental pact between big business, big labor, and big government, its standardized mass production, its Keynesian steering of the economy, its fixed exchange rates, and its global guarantee by United States military power, had produced, or at least seemed to have produced, a graspable, predictable, and steadily progressing form of society." William H. Sewell, Jr., "Crooked Lines," American Historical Review 113, no. 2 (April 2008): 393–405, here 399.

Now, although rueful about my ungenerous tone, I still believe I was right in my general understanding: times really were changing. Historiography was undergoing what Geoff Eley would later describe as "the huge tectonic shift from social history to cultural history."³ Both the content and the form of knowledge were in contention. Looking back, I wish I could recast that conversation more gently, but I would still say that the discipline of history itself has an eventful history responsive to other disciplines and changes in the world. I would also suggest that history evinces losses as well as gains and, more perversely, often witnesses the two transmute into one another, the gains of one generation looking like losses to the next. The older historian's bright narrative had material, political, and epistemological foundations that seismic forces inside and outside the academy had undermined by 1984. This narrative's crumbling certainty had been washed out to sea along with those elusive fish. It could not be reeled back in.

Like me, but a few years later, all four contributors to this forum came of age as historians in the wake of the variously denominated "turns." Judith Surkis describes these turns as "a rapid succession of historiographical moments" seemingly initiated by "the linguistic turn" and "followed by the cultural and the imperial, and more recently the transnational, global, and spatial turns." However, the shared experience of these contributors counts for little. Their essays diverge sharply over the nature of the changes in historical practice over the last forty years and what they mean for the discipline today, what has been lost and what has been gained, and who is to blame. Judith Surkis dispels the linguistic turn into an airy chimera, contending that there was no turn. Gary Wilder believes in the reality of the turn from social to cultural history, but like Surkis argues that "turn talk" has authorized "analytic regression." These two dark visions are counterbalanced by brighter views. Durba Ghosh plots imperial history's several pivots, landing us, she argues, back in the archives with modestly enhanced tools for textual analysis and broader categories of personhood. Only James Cook portrays the turns as fully productive and far from over, even now definitively altering our approaches and the objects of our scrutiny, our understanding of power, agency, and resistance.

In short, the stakes of this forum are both empirical and prescriptive. Empirically, did something happen to transform historical understanding, and if so, is it over? Prescriptively, was what happened productive, and how best are we to proceed? This is fascinating stuff. Along the way, we meet a menagerie of animals, a drove of transportation devices, a catalogue of pirouetting perspectives, some popular songs, and an array of emotions from dismay to optimism. As commentator, I take it as my brief to map these responses, asking, most importantly, what interests each narration serves. If history is, as Reinhart Koselleck suggests, in league with the future, then it is fair to interrogate each position for the future possibilities it might authorize.⁴ I will then rotate toward “the environmental turn,” neglected by this forum and by most sophisticated recent historiography, the absence in the midst of all that is present.

³ Geoff Eley, A Crooked Line: From Cultural History to the History of Society (Ann Arbor, Mich., 2005), xii.

WEARING HER BRILLIANCE BOLDLY, French historian Judith Surkis does battle against “the linguistic turn,” insisting that it is inexact and “politically limiting” to use this concept in the way that William Sewell, Gabrielle Spiegel, Lynn Hunt, and others have done. Indeed, the whole idea of “the linguistic turn” is, in Surkis’s striking metaphor, a monster akin to Paul Veyne’s centaurs. Just as nothing true or false can be said about the digestive system of centaurs, nothing true or false can be said about “the linguistic turn,” a composite phenomenon presented, she claims, as a homogeneous, monolithic, generational moment, but actually a false, retrospective construct that rejects postwar revisionism and asserts a collective new beginning suspect in its “coherence and comity.” At stake most especially for Surkis are the contributions of feminist scholarship currently being consigned to a “periodized posterity and politically compromised epistemology” by Sewell and others. To defend feminist insights, Surkis wants to dispel the illusion of “the turn” by freeing us from the concept of linear time where it is lodged. Here she joins Judith Roof in “challeng[ing] the very notions of time and history” and undermining “concepts of originality, pioneer, tradition, and precedent.” The rigidly supersessionary “generational thinking” of beginnings and endings, beholden to tropes of familial reproduction, needs to be replaced with a concept of “genealogies” where recuperation is never foreclosed. In this way, the still-salient “critical resources of feminism” will not be consigned “to a chronologically and politically exhausted moment.” “A genealogical counternarrative,” Surkis tells us, “can keep multiple strains of critical interrogation open for the historiographical future.” She therefore pleads for a radical version of “untimely thinking” that rejects the possibility of loss. She proposes, in effect, an owl of Minerva that can take off from the same bough over and over again, spreading its wings in sunlight as well as shadow, as though options were never lost to time.

Surkis’s essay is engaged and compelling, yet it leaves me shaking my head. I remain unconvinced that we invoke a monstrous shibboleth when we speak of “the linguistic turn.” As already revealed in the tale of my fishing fiasco, I believed that great intellectual changes were afoot in the mid-1980s. But it is neither my experience that informs my disquiet nor a desire to downplay scholarship attuned to sexuality and gender. Rather, what perplexes me is Surkis’s understanding of eventfulness. By her implicit strictures, to attain the status of a real event, “the turn” must evince three characteristics: concision, homogeneity, and uniformity. She speaks of “the concise movement that a ‘turn’ is supposed to describe.” Further, she is troubled by the range of disputes, nuances, and ambiguities, concluding that “the complex debates that took place in the 1980s and 1990s—about discourse and subjectivity, or the relationship between ‘linguistic’ structures, agency, and experience—show that there was no singular ‘turn.’”⁵ Third, pointing to the varying tempos and concerns in arenas such as subaltern studies, she shows that discussions constituting the “supposed” linguistic turn “did not occur once and for all, in an orderly logic of progression and supersession, or uniformly across the discipline.” These criteria puzzle me. “Linguistic turn” as a phrase may indeed be misleading if it conveys a crisp volte-face followed by consensus, but the same is true of terms such as “French Revolution” that also mask a welter of actions and impulses. The scholars involved in the turn, the very ones she cites, would be the last to say that they had executed a precise military-style maneuver or that it had been anything other than argumentative and uneven. Indeed, the turn’s lack of concision, homogeneity, and disciplinary uniformity is hardly in contention. But do these characteristics, rightly discerned by Surkis, disqualify it as an intellectual event?

⁴ Reinhart Koselleck speaks of history’s “anticipatory content” in “On the Need for Theory in the Discipline of History,” trans. Kerstin Behnke, in Koselleck, The Practice of Conceptual History: Timing History, Spacing Concepts (Stanford, Calif., 2002), 1–19, here 5, 7–8.

It is here, with the concept of “the event,” that we need to pause for a moment. The question of whether or not the linguistic turn—described as the progenitor of all the other turns—existed, whether it is a mythic centaur or a true lion, is crucial to this forum. The nature of our quarry must be discerned; we can hardly go hunting otherwise. On this issue, Martin Jay’s distinction between run-of-the-mill occurrences best understood through contextualization and those rare phenomena called “events” that “radically upend their contexts” is particularly illuminating.⁶ Had all the texts of that time been fully comprehensible through the intentions of the actors as “communicative acts dependent on the conventions and usages of their day,” then they would have been easier to read and analyzable by the means proposed by “Quentin Skinner, J. G. A. Pocock and their colleagues in the so-called Cambridge school of intellectual history.”⁷ Had Surkis discovered that the linguistic turn had been articulated in uniform fashion simultaneously by historians in every corner of the field, she would have excavated not a transformation but, in Foucault’s terms, the regularities of a well-established epistemic regime. The work on linguistic structures, agency, and experience would then have constituted not a “turn,” but a development; not a transformation, but a continuation.

Events, on the other hand, are altogether different creatures. Quoting Claude Romano, Martin Jay argues that events cannot be “submitted to a horizon of prior meanings” but “are themselves the origin of meaning for any interpretation, in that they can be understood less from the world that precedes them than from the posterity to which they give rise.” They break with patterned regularities and escape their context to be “world-establishing,” “inaugurating their own history” instead of being the product of history.⁸ If we make this distinction, at least for heuristic pur-

⁵ It may be helpful here to distinguish between the linguistic turn and the cultural turn, as Gabrielle M. Spiegel elegantly does: “Whereas linguistic turn historiography proclaimed culture as a self-enclosed, non-referential mechanism of social construction that preceded the world and rendered it intelligible by constructing it according to its own rules of signification, cultural history never abandoned a belief in the objective reality of the social world, and thus might more profitably have been labeled sociocultural history.” Spiegel, “Comment on A Crooked Line,” American Historical Review 113, no. 2 (April 2008): 406–416, here 409, emphasis in the original.

⁶ This phrase is one that Jay quotes from French theorist Claude Romano. Martin Jay, “Historical Explanation and the Event: Reflections on the Limits of Contextualization,” New Literary History 42 (2011): 557–571, here 564.

⁷ Ibid., 577, emphasis in the original. This essay begins with a lengthy discussion of the Cambridge school’s position and the subsequent debates over their stress on context.

⁸ Ibid., 564.

poses, we must use criteria other than those proposed by Surkis for asking whether the turn occurred. We should ask not if it was coherent, but if it altered what we took to be real. We should ask not whether it was logical and uniform, but whether it produced new objects of inquiry and new ways of talking about them. By these criteria of eventfulness, it seems to me that the profession did, in fact, experience a major event. By the 1990s, we were not as we once were. We continue to live and to work in the turn's wake.

ONE MAY DISAGREE WITH SURKIS'S contention that there was no turn, as do I and the other contributors, and still share her anxiety that doors are closing on rigorous self-reflective practices. Wilder, closest to Surkis in his outlook, shares her dismay at current trends. Calling on historians "to ask questions about the conditions of possibility of the historical knowledge that they are producing—about the genealogy of their categories and their embeddedness in the social worlds they purport to explain, about their own implication in their objects of study, and the relation between those pasts and the historian's present," he instead finds "antipathy to theory, an allergy to intellectual discord, and a will to professional reconciliation." Although he provides footnotes replete with titles exemplifying best practices, he judges the field to have turned away from "the turn" to banal complacency. Fascinatingly, he castigates not those anti-turners or the diehard Rankeans who have always been dismissive about the value of theorizing, but the turners themselves for the enforced pall of politeness, this apoliticized "peace in the neighborhood."⁹ Exactly who these retrograde former proponents are remains obscure, since he insists that he does not wish to name names.¹⁰ Wilder's primary desideratum, different from Surkis's, is to recover and defend the insights of social history and dialectical Marxism, which, he claims, were rejected wholesale by the linguistic and cultural turns.¹¹ He insists that "crafting a history for and of our times will require us to move beyond the insidious logic of turns in order to reclaim the analytic space where history, social science, and critical theory once converged around large and pressing sociohistorical questions." Like Surkis's, his is a recovery mission, an effort at pre-turn recuperation.

Wilder's voice is passionate and his goals are clear and bracing, yet his essay strikes me as divided against itself. Its tale of dissipated intellectual vigor is at odds with its many references to vibrant, accomplished work such as Todd Shepard's Invention of Decolonization and Jeremy Popkin's You Are All Free, and to efforts, such as Sewell's, to combine the cultural turn with social history.¹² Wilder is surely right that among "turners" and younger scholars, there are some who long for "a new nominalism," promoting a methodological positivism and an "archival fetishism" more concerned with topics than optics. The desire for "the consolation of a truth in the past which cannot be questioned" can be overwhelming even for so subtle a theorist as Roland Barthes, who, in the wake of his beloved mother's death, poignantly sought that perdurable truth in photography.¹³ Yet the wealth of references that Wilder provides suggest that his story could have been told differently, clearing new ground for histories of society built on the foundation of the turns' insights. Wilder's story of the cultural turn's strong-armed rejection of social history followed by the profession's rejection of even the turn's self-critical posture leaves us mired in longing for an irretrievable golden age of social history without recourse.

⁹ Frequently mentioned in this company, though largely neglected in this forum, are Lawrence Stone, "History and Post-Modernism," Past and Present, no. 131 (May 1991): 217–218; Bryan D. Palmer, Descent into Discourse: The Reification of Language and the Writing of Social History (Philadelphia, 1990); G. R. Elton, Return to Essentials: Some Reflections on the Present State of Historical Study (Cambridge, 1991). Less extreme within this group is Richard J. Evans, In Defense of History (New York, 1997).

¹⁰ Wilder, however, pointedly distinguishes among the turners on some scores. For instance, he writes: "Note that the critique of the linguistic and cultural turns from the standpoint of 'society' developed by Sewell, Eley, and Goswami differs fundamentally from the call by Bonnell and Hunt for a renewed social history and historical sociology 'beyond the cultural turn.'"

¹¹ While Wilder contends that "because the talk of turns objectified 'social history' as a singular package, the turn away from it was often wholesale," others have described the relationship between social and cultural history as "more dialectical than merely sequential." Editor's introduction to "AHR Forum: Geoff Eley's A Crooked Line," American Historical Review 113, no. 2 (April 2008): 391–392, here 391.

BY CONTRAST, DURBA GHOSH PORTRAYS imperial history's broad concurrence today as heartening. She masterfully charts its several reorientations through engagements with "other historiographical turns—the global, the postcolonial, and the archival," in order to argue that the imperial turn has been produced by and generated other historiographical developments. Contra Surkis and Cook, she sees these turns as explicitly generational, with "tensions between gray-haired patriarchs, younger matriarchs, and an unruly group of interdisciplinary graduate students, postdoctoral fellows, and untenured faculty setting off on a long road trip in an overstuffed minivan." Although concerned that generational "turn talk" might foreclose self-reflection, she ultimately embraces familial affinities, arguing that current scholarship feeds on the generative energies that transformed the profession in the 1980s and 1990s. If Ghosh now proclaims a "return to the archives," this is not a retreat to some prelapsarian world before the turns. Rather, she portrays a regained archival adventurism by macho, swashbuckling younger scholars (playfully including herself) as overcoming the archive-versus-theory dichotomy in a new synthesis. Here a note of warning should be sounded. Talk of a "return to the archive" risks repeating the canard that "theory heads" had abandoned the high ground of dedicated research.¹⁴ This charge was mostly caricature. Rather than being for-or-against archival labor, central arguments were about the nature of archives, how they are constituted, what they leave out, and whether we could explore them "naked" in the manner of Geoffrey Elton or had to approach them mindful of our own positionality and commitments.¹⁵ Ghosh, building on the rearticulation of the nature of the archives by fem-

¹² Wilder argues that the reception of the books by Shepard and Popkin smoothed over their fundamental challenge to our understanding of events such as the "French Revolution."

¹³ It is in these terms that John Tagg describes Barthes's quest in Camera Lucida to find in photography the absolute guarantee of "a reality" even though it is a "reality one can no longer touch." Tagg, The Burden of Representation: Essays on Photographies and Histories (Minneapolis, 1988), 1.

¹⁴ Ghosh cites several imperial historians who have voiced concern about the abandonment of the archives, including Richard M. Eaton, "(Re)imag(in)ing Otherness: A Postmortem for the Postmodern in India," Journal of World History 11, no. 1 (Spring 2000): 57–78; and Matthew Connolly in "AHR Conversation: On Transnational History," American Historical Review 111, no. 5 (December 2006): 1441–1464.

¹⁵ E. H. Carr makes a mockery of historians who try to walk in the archives as "in the Garden of Eden, without a scrap of philosophy to cover them, naked and unashamed before the god of history." Carr, inist and queer studies scholars such as Ann Stoler, Anjali Arondekar, and Elizabeth Kolsky, celebrates an “archival turn” that “relies on strategies of ‘theorizing about texts,’ while doing a lot of gathering at the same time.” Today she sees raucous comity, depicting the squabbling passengers in imperial history’s minivan as sharing a “political project—anti-colonialism and anti-imperialism—with disagreements about the value of different disciplinary methodologies.”

While Surkis and Wilder might label this comity a source of worry, a resistance to articulating higher stakes, Ghosh depicts it as contentiously productive. While Surkis and Wilder distrust generational “turn talk,” Ghosh discerns progressive family legacies. But while Ghosh maps an agreed-upon destination for imperial history’s road trip, Cook depicts “the cultural turn” as so explosively dynamic across such a wide spectrum of subfields that there can be no single endpoint. Indeed, he speaks not of “the turn” but of “the turns,” not of something we are “beyond” but of continuing, mutating energies feeding the field today. Nor are we locked in oedipal contests; indeed, we are not even “we” in a generational sense. “The kids are all right” precisely because they share their parents’ engaged style of self-reflective history, driven to understand past interactions and ideas with an expanding repertoire of analytical moves.

JAMES COOK, AFTER REVEALING the surprising paucity of references to the “cultural turn” before the late 1990s, examines the moment when the use of this phrase shoots skyward, precipitated most particularly by Victoria Bonnell and Lynn Hunt’s Beyond the Cultural Turn, which arrived not to praise “the turn” but to bury it. Cook points to this moment’s “dramatic refashioning of the story . . . from the live and bracing debates of Eley and Samuel to the fixed and finished turn of Bonnell and Hunt.” As his clever graft shows, the “declensionists” who tried to place “the cultural turn” in its coffin were the very ones who spurred it to life as a contentious concept. What followed the premature funeral was a spate of competing master narratives using this very phrase to excavate historiography’s recent past. These narratives tended to revolve around a certain “timeframe (1960s to the 1990s), setting (one or another corner of the European field), narrative arc (rise and fall), and authorial voice (the generational ‘we’),” and it is here, most especially, that Cook wishes to intervene in order to transform the story from one about “the turn” to one about continuing, multiple turns. He questions each element of this four-part template and revises the tight generational, subdisciplinary tale by opening it up to the present, broadening our focus away from Europe and European imperialism, rejecting the autumnal gloom of “an ending,” and embracing the scholarship of younger people who, far from rejecting the turn, are pushing it onward into new variants.

Looking at today’s scholarship, Cook demonstrates that on the ground level of history-writing, the dissonance spawned by the cultural turn has been enormously productive, leading to attentiveness to a whole range of circulating cultural forms,

What Is History? (New York, 1962), 21. See G. R. Elton, The Practice of History (London, 1967), and most especially his attack on the linguistic turn in Return to Essentials. See also Keith Jenkins, On “What Is History?” From Carr and Elton to Rorty and White (London, 1995).

including capitalism, neglected in earlier iterations of “the cultural turn.” Walter Johnson’s work on slavery, Soul by Soul, is singled out in this regard for revealing the ways the continuing turns combine discursive and economic analysis, allowing the mutual constitutiveness of the cultural and the social to emerge. In short, Cook takes up the challenge and the optimism of Eley’s still-unfolding story, suggesting not only that “it” is far from over, but that the widening ripples of the turns extend across the globe. In the manner of true events, one might say, the recent changes in historiography were “world-establishing,” creating hitherto unimagined spaces for exploration, inaugurating a history that cannot be buried, and giving us a future productively at odds with the past.

AN ENERVATING POLITESSE MAY HAVE descended in some quarters of the profession, but the voices in this forum evince no complacency. Instead, there is passion and intelligence in grappling with our position. Yet my own sense is that we still understand only dimly the forces reshaping our field and our world over the past few decades, and that these essays, broad and bracing though they are, are not broad and bracing enough. Perhaps, as Nietzsche noted in Beyond Good and Evil, “the greatest events and thoughts (and the greatest thoughts are the greatest events) are comprehended most slowly. The generations which are their contemporaries do not experience, do not ‘live through’ them—they live alongside them.”¹⁶ Alongside the turns analyzed here, a world-altering force has been emerging, one larger, more devastating, and more definitive even than the “contemporary flexible forms of capitalism” emphasized by Sewell: I speak of climate change—or climate collapse—and all of its related global transformations.¹⁷ Wilder rightly insists that we be mindful of “the conditions of possibility of the historical knowledge” we produce, yet the most fundamental of these conditions of possibility, the environment itself, has gotten short shrift from most of us. If we accept that historians need to be conscious of the material basis of the means of production—our own as well as past generations’—and that contemporary predicaments necessarily inform our understanding of the ¹⁶ Friedrich Wilhelm Nietzsche, Beyond Good and Evil, trans. Marianne Cowan (Chicago, 1955), 230.

¹⁷ William H. Sewell, Logics of History: Social Theory and Social Transformation (Chicago, 2005), 62. The older insistence on “capitalism” as the culprit in climate collapse has been disputed. For instance, Kenneth Pomeranz argues, “if one measures industrialization not by the market value of the output but by the quantities of land and people that become involved—probably more relevant criteria for environmental historians—then noncapitalist (or at most semicapitalist) regimes have presided over most of the spread of industrialization.” Pomeranz, “Introduction: World History and Environmental History,” in Edmund Burke III and Kenneth Pomeranz, eds., The Environment and World History (Berkeley, Calif., 2009), 3–32, here 8. For this argument, see also Robert B. Marks, “Commercialization without Capitalism: Processes of Environmental Change in South China, 1550–1850,” Environmental History 1, no. 1 (January 1996): 56–82. The phrase “climate collapse,” as opposed to “climate change,” is favored by David W. Orr, Down to the Wire: Confronting Climate Collapse (Oxford, 2009). The literature on climate change in general is vast. See, for instance, David Archer and Stefan Rahmstorf, The Climate Crisis: An Introductory Guide to Climate Change (Cambridge, 2010); Clark A. Miller and Paul N. Edwards, Changing the Atmosphere: Expert Knowledge and Environmental Governance (Cambridge, Mass., 2001); Spencer R. Weart, The Discovery of Global Warming (Cambridge, Mass., 2003); Elizabeth Kolbert, Field Notes from a Catastrophe: Man, Nature, and Climate Change (New York, 2006); Paul N. Edwards, A Vast Machine: Computer Models, Climate Data, and the Politics of Global Warming (Cambridge, Mass., 2010); WorldWatch Institute, State of the World, 2010: Transforming Cultures—From Consumerism to Sustainability (New York, 2010); Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, Fourth Assessment Report: Climate Change 2007, 3 vols. (New York, 2007).

past, environmental consciousness makes exacting intellectual demands. This “new materialism” will produce new questions, new objects of study, and new types of evidence beyond those developed through the social, linguistic, cultural, and imperial turns.¹⁸

Understanding the history of our altered physical world will require us to readapt our magpie tendencies and steal some eggs from the nests of scientists. Such intellectual thievery marked prior turns. In the 1960s and '70s, social history was energized by the collateral disciplines of economics and sociology; then, with the linguistic and cultural turns in the 1980s and '90s, anthropology, cultural studies, and literary theory reoriented our outlook. Now it is to our more distant intellectual cousins in biology, chemistry, physics, and related fields that we must turn. We are currently devouring “the [natural] resources and services of 1.3 Earths. In other words, people are using about a third more of Earth’s capacity than is available, undermining the resilience of the very ecosystems on which humanity depends.”¹⁹ To understand how this unprecedented situation arose, we must reconsider what counts as a “fact,” what level of interaction requires analysis, how one narrates such a history, where one gathers evidence.²⁰ In its general silence on these matters, this forum accurately represents our discipline’s still-halting engagement with the monstrously difficult problem of how to execute an environmental turn.

One can be either pessimistic or optimistic about the likelihood of our meeting this radical challenge to our practices. Pessimistic because the difficulties of analyzing the organic and inorganic substrates of history dwarf the difficulties posed by reconfigured concepts of context and text. While we may be inching toward “a historiography that acknowledges both the social, contextual determinants of thought and behavior in the past and the mediating role played by language and culture in their functioning” in what Gabrielle Spiegel calls the “unified field theory” of history, accommodation more broadly between the competing realities of human social and cultural histories, on the one hand, and nature’s realities as described by science, on the other, is truly thorny.²¹ Science speaks in different temporalities with such concepts as the Anthropocene; produces different notions of agency with the interactions of entire species, chemically altered brains, and inorganic forces; and, even more cantankerously, insists on not making “normative statements,” manifesting an allergy to the very articulations of value and meaning rightly prized by engaged history. Science as science has nothing to say about the desirability of social justice or even of human survival. Engaging the sciences should not rekindle false dreams of history being a science. In remaining true to our calling, historians will find that our conversations with scientists often seem like very rough translations.

¹⁸ I discuss Sebastiano Timpanaro’s phrase “the new materialism,” which appeared in On Materialism (London, 1980; orig. Italian ed. 1970), briefly in Reconfiguring Modernity: Concepts of Nature in Japanese Political Ideology (Berkeley, Calif., 2001) and at greater length in “Atarashii busshitsu shugi” (The New Materialism), the preface to the Japanese translation, Kindai no saikochiku: Nihon seiji ideorogi ni okeru shizen no gainen (Tokyo, 2008). Older Marxist explorations of the way that “materialism” might be expanded to encompass the environment include André Gorz, Ecology as Politics (Boston, 1980; orig. French ed. 1975); and Gorz, Capitalism, Socialism, Ecology (London, 1994; orig. French ed. 1991). For more recent work on the new materialism and politics, see Diana Coole and Samantha Frost, eds., New Materialisms: Ontology, Agency, and Politics (Durham, N.C., 2010), especially Jason Edwards, “The Materialism of Historical Materialism,” 281–298; Jane Bennett, Vibrant Matter: A Political Ecology of Things (Durham, N.C., 2010); and Mick Smith, Against Ecological Sovereignty: Ethics, Biopolitics, and Saving the Natural World (Minneapolis, 2011).

¹⁹ WorldWatch Institute, The State of the World, 2010, 4.

²⁰ Engaged work on this question of how environmental studies challenge historical practices has begun in earnest, but more must be done. My own modest attempts to articulate this problem can be found in Ian J. Miller, Julia Adeney Thomas, and Brett L. Walker, eds., Japan at Nature’s Edge: The Environmental Context of a Global Power (Honolulu, forthcoming 2012); “From Modernity with Freedom to Sustainability with Decency: Politicizing Passivity,” in Kimberly Coulter and Christof Mauch, eds., The Future of Environmental History: Needs and Opportunities (Munich, 2011), 53–56; and “The Exquisite Corpses of Nature and History: The Case of the Korean DMZ,” in Chris Pearson, Peter Coates, and Tim Cole, eds., Militarized Landscapes: From Gettysburg to Salisbury Plain (London, 2010), 151–168.

On the other hand, the possibility of optimism rests precisely on the theoretical mindfulness produced by the turns. In articulating competing ways of describing power, competing ways of understanding power’s agents and operations, and, ultimately, competing modes of creativity and resistance, the theoretical engagements within our profession, as Cook shows, have produced nimbleness of mind and flexibility of outlook.²² Thoughtful debates over representation and the limits of our capacity to comprehend totalities (while we yearn to do so) will aid us in addressing the new materialism. But they will, I think, be inadequate. The tectonic plates that shifted in the early 1980s are once again causing ruptures that cannot be “submitted to a horizon of prior meanings.” Neither recuperating the approaches of feminism or social history as they were before “turn talk” nor celebrating the fruits of these turns’ continuing productivity will be sufficient to understand the precarious state of our world. Only with a readiness to accept eventfulness, weather loss without consolation, and yet persevere in the spirit of willed, generous optimism can history constitute the new optic now required. In short, were I to return to the ocean—30 percent more acidic than it was at the beginning of the industrial revolution and, since 1950, depleted of 40 percent of the phytoplankton that produces much of our oxygen—the sharp decline in fishing stocks would make my feeble casting skills even more evident. But my understanding of the tensions between the hopes of human history and the determinations of our manifestly material nature have been sharpened, and I would come with new criteria for the formation of historical knowledge.²³

²¹ Spiegel, “Comment on A Crooked Line,” 410.

²² “Indeed,” as Geoff Eley says, “being a historian during the last third of the twentieth century has required learning to live with a condition of virtually continuous flux.” A Crooked Line, 8.

²³ Never in the last 300 million years has the ocean acidified at the current rate. See Bärbel Hönlisch et al., “The Geological Record of Ocean Acidification,” Science 335, no. 6072 (March 2, 2012): 1058–1063. On fish depletion, see Ranson A. Myers and Boris Worm, “Rapid Worldwide Depletion of Predatory Fish Communities,” Nature 423 (May 15, 2003): 280–283; Boris Worm et al., “Impacts of Biodiversity Loss on Ocean Ecosystem Services,” Science 314, no. 5800 (November 3, 2006): 787–790, here 787.

Julia Adeney Thomas is Associate Professor of History at the University of Notre Dame. She writes on the intellectual and political history of Japan, photography and museums, and environmental history’s impact on historiography. She is the author of the prizewinning book Reconfiguring Modernity: Concepts of Nature in Japanese Political Ideology (University of California Press, 2001). She is currently finishing Ever So Real: Photography’s Politics in Japan, 1940–60, which explores the civic space created with the camera during the war, during the occupation, and thereafter.

AHR Forum
Comment: Generational Turns

NATHAN PERL-ROSENTHAL

One generation goes, another comes,
But the earth remains the same forever

Ecclesiastes 1:4

THE TURN IS DEAD; LONG LIVE THE TURN. Just as early modern Europeans hailed a new king and in the same breath mourned his predecessor, the essays in this forum announce the turn's rebirth as they pronounce its epitaph. The authors offer compelling arguments for rejecting turn talk and the idea of scholarly generations on which it is based. As they observe, turns are often described in an almost religious language of conversion experiences and about-faces. This language reifies what came before and suggests that it has been decisively supplanted by another way of writing and thinking. The authors rightly reject this practice as more apt to foreclose thinking than to stimulate it.¹ At the same time, in somewhat contradictory fashion, they suggest that there are troubling developments occurring now in their respective areas of specialization. Wilder observes the formation of a "disciplinary consensus" that aims to blunt the force of innovative work on French imperialism. Cook and Surkis record the declarations by senior scholars that the cultural and linguistic turns are over. Ghosh notes a strand within the new imperial history that seems to ignore postcolonial historiography.

The authors' rejection of turn talk and their concerns about current scholarship are both rooted in the particular notion of historical generations that they embrace. In their articles, the contributors imagine generations as existing primarily in sequence, with each rising generation supplanting or superseding the earlier one.² This concept of generations has a long history: it was a common trope in Weimar Germany, and it is essentially the one that is peddled to us on a daily basis by Madison Avenue, with its continual refocusing on the pleasures and preferences of young consumers.³ It is also embedded in the way that the senior scholars whom the authors cite as historiographic masters have described their own scholarly trajectories, linking their embrace of various turns to landmarks in their own autobiographies.⁴ If turn talk is indeed nothing more than a way to declare that something new has arrived to displace the old, then the contributors to this forum are right to dismiss it as barren and unhelpful.

I am grateful to the following individuals for discussions of this essay and/or comments on draft versions of it: David Armitage, David A. Bell, Konstantin Dierks, Philip J. Ethington, Eric Foner, Peter Mancall, Jessica Marglin, Samuel Moyn, David N. Myers, Robert A. Schneider, and especially Vanessa R. Schwartz.

¹ For the "foreclosure effect," see Gary Wilder's and Judith Surkis's contributions to this forum.

² Wilder does not state this point explicitly, but his account of Laurent Dubois's work expresses most strongly of all the idea that new approaches (in his case, an Atlantic-centered approach to the history of the French Revolution) must displace earlier approaches.

However, the account of historiographic generation that underpins both the authors' rejection of turn talk and their anxieties about the future strikes me as somewhat counterintuitive and unsatisfying. There is another dimension to the familial metaphor of the generation that can be elided by focusing too narrowly on the drama of supersession. I am referring, of course, to the deep continuities between the old and the young that talk of generations implies. In its strongest formulation, this way of seeing generations denies the very possibility of supersession. One group of scholars must eventually give way to another in the natural course of events. But the rising group is formed by the passing one and is inculcated with their values and preoccupations. The passage from one to the other is at least as much a moment of continuity as of rupture.⁵ Indeed, the forum essays themselves embody this kind of non-supersessionist generational shift. The authors willingly employ the distinctive technical vocabulary of the cultural and linguistic turns, so that there is a genetic similarity in language and style of argumentation between their essays here and the writings of the earlier generation whom they critique.⁶

The contributors to this forum, tenured and training students in their own right, are now the older generation to a younger cohort, of which I am a member. That relationship offers the opportunity to reexamine the balance between continuity and disjuncture in scholarly generations. Reflecting on this new cohort, composed as it is of individuals who have not yet published their first books, means looking at unpublished dissertations. I will focus here on around twenty drawn from my areas of specialization, early modern Western Europe and North America. These selections, while necessarily personal and idiosyncratic, cover a wide range of regions and topics. Together they show a strong shift among younger scholars toward novel objects of study, the adoption of a shared mode of analysis based on practice and process, and a return to intensive archival research. These shifts are rooted in the particular intellectual and political context of the cohort's training, but they do not mark a caesura with the previous generation. Indeed, they suggest that a revised language of turns still has value as a way to articulate and analyze historiographic change.

³ See Peter E. Gordon, Continental Divide: Heidegger, Cassirer, Davos (Cambridge, Mass., 2010), 48–51; and Jackson Lears, Fables of Abundance: A Cultural History of Advertising in America (New York, 1994), 168–169.

⁴ For examples of this, see especially William H. Sewell, Jr., Logics of History: Social Theory and Social Transformation (Chicago, 2005), 40–45; Geoff Eley, A Crooked Line: From Cultural History to the History of Society (Ann Arbor, Mich., 2005), 90–93. The process is well discussed in Cook's essay.

⁵ Two remarkable works that reflect on this process of intergenerational linkage in very different ways are Yosef Hayim Yerushalmi, Zakhor: Jewish History and Jewish Memory (Seattle, Wash., 1982); and David Hackett Fischer, Albion's Seed: Four British Folkways in America (New York, 1989).

⁶ The phrase "historiographic turn" is itself one of these markers: in ordinary speech, the noun "turn" is rarely used with adjectives that do not denote speed or direction (e.g., "fast," "right").

THREE TOPICS OR TYPES OF OBJECTS have attracted the interest of many younger early modernists: histories of communication, transportation, and material culture.⁷ Scholarship on communications draws on the increasingly rich history of the book, but applies its methods far beyond the codex and the classic questions of cultural history.⁸ The history of transportation has evolved from a topic of almost purely antiquarian interest into a vibrant theme of new research in a wide variety of geographic and temporal areas. In the early modern period, its most prominent manifestation has been a renewal of maritime history.⁹ Though these historians are asking questions drawn from outside the traditional history of transportation (especially labor, economic, and environmental history), they have rethought those problems in light of the centrality of transportation and its practicalities to the sea-centered

⁷ A fifth major area that has developed in recent years is the history of political economy. This includes such important work as Sophus A. Reinert, Translating Empire: Emulation and the Origins of Political Economy (Cambridge, Mass., 2011); Jose R. Torre, The Political Economy of Sentiment: Paper Credit and the Scottish Enlightenment in Early Republic Boston, 1780–1820 (London, 2007); Seth Rockman, Scraping By: Wage Labor, Slavery, and Survival in Early Baltimore (Baltimore, 2009); Paul Cheney, Revolutionary Commerce: Globalization and the French Monarchy (Cambridge, Mass., 2010); John Shovlin, The Political Economy of Virtue: Luxury, Patriotism, and the Origins of the French Revolution (Ithaca, N.Y., 2006); and Carl Wennerlind, Casualties of Credit: The English Financial Revolution, 1620–1720 (Cambridge, Mass., 2011). Because its growth has been particularly precocious in the early modern period and its practitioners have mostly published monographs already, it is visible to the wider profession, so I do not focus on it here.

⁸ On the early modern history of the book, see especially Robert Darnton, The Literary Underground of the Old Regime (Cambridge, Mass., 1982); Darnton, The Forbidden Best-Sellers of Pre-Revolutionary France (New York, 1995); Roger Chartier, Lectures et lecteurs dans la France d'ancien régime (Paris, 1987); Anthony Grafton, Defenders of the Text: The Traditions of Scholarship in an Age of Science, 1450–1800 (Cambridge, Mass., 1991); Ann Blair, Too Much to Know: Managing Scholarly Information before the Modern Age (New Haven, Conn., 2010). In the Anglo-American context, see, among others, Richard D. Brown, Knowledge Is Power: The Diffusion of Information in Early America, 1700–1865 (New York, 1989); Robert A. Gross and Mary Kelley, eds., An Extensive Republic: Print, Culture, and Society in the New Nation, 1790–1840 (Chapel Hill, N.C., 2010); Richard B. Sher, The Enlightenment and the Book: Scottish Authors and Their Publishers in Eighteenth-Century Britain, Ireland, and America (Chicago, 2006). The theme of communications is important in a number of recent dissertations: Kenneth Bernard Loisselle, “‘New but true friends’: Freemasonry and the Culture of Male Friendship in Eighteenth-Century France” (Ph.D. diss., Yale University, 2007); Jeremy Caradonna, “The Enlightenment in Question: Academic Prize Competitions (concours académiques) and the Francophone Republic of Letters, 1670–1794” (Ph.D. diss., Johns Hopkins University, 2008); Noah Chaim Millstone, “Plot’s Commonwealth: The Circulation of Manuscripts and the Practice of Politics in Early Stuart England, c. 1614–1640” (Ph.D. diss., Stanford University, 2011); Alejandra Dubcovsky, “Connected Worlds: Communication Networks in the Colonial Southeast, 1513–1740” (Ph.D. diss., University of California, Berkeley, 2011); Jessica M. Lepler, “1837: Anatomy of a Panic” (Ph.D. diss., Brandeis University, 2007); and Joseph M. Adelman, “The Business of Politics: Printers and the Emergence of Political Communications Networks, 1765–1776” (Ph.D. diss., Johns Hopkins University, 2010). My own dissertation, Nathan Perl-Rosenthal, “Corresponding Republics: Letter Writing and Patriot Organizing in the Atlantic Revolutions, circa 1760–1792” (Columbia University, 2011), fits into this category as well. See also Jeremy Caradonna, The Enlightenment in Practice: Academic Prize Contests and Intellectual Culture in France, 1670–1794 (Ithaca, N.Y., 2012).

⁹ See Niklas Erik Frykman, “The Wooden World Turned Upside Down: Naval Mutinies in the Age of Atlantic Revolution” (Ph.D. diss., University of Pittsburgh, 2010); Brian J. Rouleau, “With Sails Whitening Every Sea: Commercial Expansion, Maritime Empire, and the American Seafaring Community Abroad, 1780–1870” (Ph.D. diss., University of Pennsylvania, 2010); Denver Alexander Brunsman, “The Evil Necessity: British Naval Impressment in the Eighteenth-Century Atlantic World” (Ph.D. diss., Princeton University, 2004); Charles R. Foy, “Ports of Slavery, Ports of Freedom: How Slaves Used Northern Seaports’ Maritime Industry to Escape and Create Trans-Atlantic Identities, 1713–1783” (Ph.D. diss., Rutgers University, 2008); and Rachel Tamar Van, “Free Trade and Family Values: Kinship Networks and the Culture of Early American Capitalism” (Ph.D. diss., Columbia University, 2011).

early modern world.¹⁰ Younger scholars' interest in material culture has been spurred by work in two areas, the history of science and visual studies, that have moved rapidly from the margins to the center over the past generation. Much of the newest scholarship focuses on extra-European science, the environment, and knowledge-making through visual and material sources.¹¹

In working on these topics, the younger scholars all devote considerable effort to answering what one of them, Noah Millstone, calls the "pragmatic" questions: How does it work? How does it happen?¹² This can mean reconstructing the complex Atlantic and global processes that turned commodities into finished decorative objects, as in work by Zara Anishanslin and Molly Warsh. Or it may entail painstaking description of print, oral, and manuscript communication networks, as in work by Joseph Adelman, Alejandra Dubcovsky, and Millstone. It can even involve tracing the evanescent movements of maritime people, as Charles Foy and Niklas Frykman do. Each of these studies and others like them rest on a substantial base of archival research: there is no other way to gain an understanding of how, exactly, such sprawling, intricate systems of transportation, communication, and consumption functioned.

The forum authors offer sidelong acknowledgments of this new scholarship and express concerns about where the turn-in-progress is headed. Some believe that it represents a "new empiricism" or "new nominalism" spreading through the historical profession. Younger scholars seem to be taking positivist stances toward their sources and in some cases even believe themselves to be reconstructing the objective reality of the past. Wilder, Surkis, and Ghosh cast this development in supersessionist terms, as a rejection of the theoretical sophistication and focus on meaning that was characteristic of scholarship inflected by the linguistic and cultural turns.¹³

¹⁰ The important scholarship that influenced this new work includes Peter Linebaugh and Marcus Rediker, The Many-Headed Hydra: Sailors, Slaves, Commoners, and the Hidden History of the Revolutionary Atlantic (Boston, 2000); Daniel Vickers, Farmers and Fishermen: Two Centuries of Work in Essex County, Massachusetts, 1630–1850 (Chapel Hill, N.C., 1994); Daniel Vickers and Vince Walsh, Young Men and the Sea: Yankee Seafarers in the Age of Sail (New Haven, Conn., 2005); Margaret S. Creighton and Lisa Norling, Iron Men, Wooden Women: Gender and Seafaring in the Atlantic World, 1700–1920 (Baltimore, 1996); Lisa Norling, Captain Ahab Had a Wife: New England Women and the Whalefishery, 1720–1870 (Chapel Hill, N.C., 2000); Alain Cabantous, La mer et les hommes: Pêcheurs et matelots dunkerquois de Louis XIV à la Révolution (Dunkerque, 1980); Cabantous, Dix mille marins face à l'océan: Les populations maritimes de Dunkerque au Havre aux XVII^e et XVIII^e siècles (vers 1660–1794): Étude sociale (Paris, 1991); Greg Denning, Mr. Bligh's Bad Language: Passion, Power, and Theatre on the Bounty (Cambridge, 1992).

¹¹ See especially Zara Anishanslin, "Portrait of a Woman in a Silk Dress: The Hidden Histories of Aesthetic Commodities in the Eighteenth-Century British Atlantic World" (Ph.D. diss., University of Delaware, 2009); Molly A. Warsh, "Adorning Empire: A History of the Early Modern Pearl Trade, 1492–1688" (Ph.D. diss., Johns Hopkins University, 2009); Sarah Easterby-Smith, "Cultivating Commerce: Connoisseurship, Botany and the Plant Trade in London and Paris, c. 1760–c. 1815" (D.Phil. diss., University of Warwick, 2009); Kathleen S. Murphy, "Portals of Nature: Networks of Natural History in Eighteenth-Century British Plantation Societies" (Ph.D. diss., Johns Hopkins University, 2008); and Ryan Jones, "Empire of Extinction: Nature and Natural History in the Russian North Pacific, 1739–1799" (Ph.D. diss., Columbia University, 2008).

¹² Millstone, "Plot's Commonwealth," 36. See also Van, "Free Trade and Family Values," 14, for another key "how" question.

¹³ Wilder and Surkis emphasize the role played in this process by older scholars. These older cohorts have flattened and schematized the cultural and linguistic turns in order to reject a putative extreme constructivist position. The end result of this process, both suggest, is a movement toward a positivist "social scientific" framework.

Ghosh is the most inclined to celebrate what she takes to be a potentially salutary “archival turn,” yet even she is careful to warn her readers against uncritical positivism.

However, a supersessionist view of the new scholarship, at least in the early modern period, seems mistaken to me. The emergent work does not reject the preoccupations and insights of the previous generations. It executes instead two subtle but crucial shifts of emphasis in subject matter and approach. First, while the emergent scholars emphasize the study of acts or behaviors rather than discursive texts and statements, they do so not to reject the study of meaning but in order to give a different account of the relationship between acts and culture. The languages of practice, process, and networks that they each employ focus our attention on the power of habitual action and symbol-poor practices to create meaning. Second, in part because of the central role it gives to process and practice, this scholarship emphasizes the physical and social factors that constrained how early modern people made meaning in their everyday lives.

These younger scholars write about “material practices,” the “practice of politics,” and “cultural practice.”¹⁴ In one sense, “practice” for them is simply the antonym of principle or pure intellection: it signals their emphasis on analyzing culture through behavior. In a second sense, it indicates that they are talking in particular about repeated or habitual action. On a deeper level, they and many others use the term to denote what lies between pure constructivism on one side and hard-core methodological realism or materialism on the other. It seems to imply a belief that there is a mutually constitutive relationship between the social and the cultural.¹⁵ Equally important is what the younger scholars do not mean to signal by using the term: a desire to enter into the intricate debates over “practice” that have grown up around the work of French anthropologist Pierre Bourdieu.¹⁶

Practice offers a language well suited to discussing how meaning-making occurred through ordinary, habitual behavior. There is nothing novel in the thought that people make meaning through everyday life. This was a key insight of the Annales school nearly a century ago, and in various ways it has been a mainstay of social and cultural history ever since. In this respect, the emergent early modern scholars show deep continuities with the generations of cultural and social historians who came before them. Yet for cultural historians since the 1970s, who rejected the generalizing tendency of the classic history of mentalités, exceptional and extraordinary cases or moments were often taken to be the best route into the recesses of historical actors’ minds. The forum authors mention several exemplary interpretations in this mode, including Robert Darnton’s cat massacre, Natalie Zemon Davis’s Martin Guerre, and Carlo Ginsburg’s Menocchio. This model has been widely influential, though not unquestioned: the explanatory power of exceptional cases spurred immediate debate, and a number of scholars partly moved away from it toward histories of ordinary occurrences.¹⁷

¹⁴ Quotations from Murphy, “Portals of Nature,” 19; Anishanslin, “Portrait of a Woman in a Silk Dress,” 32; Millstone, “Plot’s Commonwealth,” i.

¹⁵ For this formulation, see Carla Hesse, “The New Empiricism,” Cultural and Social History 1, no. 2 (2004): 201–207, here 206.

¹⁶ For examples of this sidestepping of the Bourdieu-centered debates, see Millstone, “Plot’s Commonwealth,” 35–36; and Easterby-Smith, “Cultivating Commerce,” 75. For capsule statements of some of these debates, see the essays in Craig J. Calhoun, Edward LiPuma, and Moishe Postone, eds., Bourdieu: Critical Perspectives (Chicago, 1993); and David L. Swartz and Vera L. Zolberg, eds., After Bourdieu: Influence, Critique, Elaboration (Dordrecht, 2004).

The early modernists of this younger generation are distinguished from earlier cohorts by their full—even exclusive—embrace of the everyday as a source of meaning. Networks of print and manuscript circulation, which are central to the projects of several of the emerging scholars working on political culture, are notable because they performed their political work over time rather than in a single, dramatic moment.¹⁸ Recent work in maritime history has similarly turned sharply away from exceptional cases, such as the Bligh mutiny, and focused increasingly on common, often repeated, practices: impressment, foreign travel, naval service.¹⁹ In histories of material culture, much of the new work has focused on chains of commodity production and exchange rather than the instant of purchase or consumption. This approach draws the eye away from the moment of exception, the instance of meaning-making at purchase, and toward the slow accretion of meanings as an object is made and traded from hand to hand.²⁰

The everyday practices at the center of these recent dissertations also seem, in many cases, to be surprisingly poor in symbolic meaning. This marks another important shift in emphasis from the previous generation of scholars. The classic cultural histories and the theorists on whom they drew, from Geertz to Foucault and Derrida, privileged the symbolic or semiotic dimension of culture. In practice, this meant that their analyses of actions and events gave pride of place to discovering the symbolic meanings encoded into actions. Such meanings were of course hidden, requiring deep excavation to make them yield their secrets. This method gave cultural history the form that we usually associate with it: close, deep readings of texts, richly contextualized. It also worked best with certain kinds of sources, notably ones that employed complex categories or rich description, which lent themselves to such analyses.

The younger scholars by no means reject close reading, but it is counterbalanced in their work by attention to how even seemingly symbol-poor practices can create meaning by instantiating social and intellectual relationships. Jeremy Caradonna's study of academic prize competitions in eighteenth-century France argues that the very act of participating in the competitions helped large numbers of individuals ¹⁷ On the idea of mentalités and its relationship to cultural history, see especially Dominick LaCapra, "Is Everyone a Mentalité Case? Transference and the 'Culture' Concept," History and Theory 23, no. 3 (October 1984): 296–311; and Robert Darnton, The Great Cat Massacre: And Other Episodes in French Cultural History (New York, 1985), 282–283 nn. 1–2. One could adduce many examples of the move back to cultural histories of ordinary behavior: one example that stands out is the wave of studies of consumption, for which in the late eighteenth century see especially T. H. Breen, "Ideology and Nationalism on the Eve of the American Revolution: Revisions Once More in Need of Revising," Journal of American History 84, no. 1 (1997): 13–39; Breen, "'Baubles of Britain': The American and Consumer Revolutions of the Eighteenth Century," Past and Present, no. 119 (May 1988): 73–104; John Brewer and Roy Porter, eds., Consumption and the World of Goods (London, 1993); and Colin Jones, "The Great Chain of Buying: Medical Advertisement, the Bourgeois Public Sphere, and the Origins of the French Revolution," American Historical Review 101, no. 1 (February 1996): 13–40.

¹⁸ See especially Millstone, "Plot's Commonwealth"; and Adelman, "The Business of Politics."

¹⁹ Brunsman, "The Evil Necessity"; Rouleau, "With Sails Whitening Every Sea"; Frykman, "The Wooden World Turned Upside Down." Frykman focuses on naval mutinies, which might appear to be exceptional rather than ordinary, but a central part of his argument is that these events were in fact quite habitual in the period he is considering and rooted in the ordinary life of sailors (the labor process) itself.

²⁰ See Anishanslin, "Portrait of a Woman in a Silk Dress"; and Warsh, "Adorning Empire."

become stakeholders in the Enlightenment. While not uninterested in the content of the prize submissions, Caradonna sees meaning (in this case, enlightened-ness) as being created more by the act of taking part than by any particular ideological position that a writer assumed.²¹ Sarah Easterby-Smith makes a somewhat similar point when she traces how the circulation of plants in wartime created “cosmopolitanism” among botanists. Maintaining international connections and continuing to circulate live plants and other botanica helped commercial nurserymen demonstrate their identities as scientific (and thus cosmopolitan) actors.²²

The use of networks as a concept and a category of analysis is the clearest manifestation of the younger scholars’ interest in the cultural content of relatively symbol-poor, everyday actions. Networks are the products of routine or even rote action, a type of behavior that by design lacks conceptual complexity and ambiguity.²³ Studying networks, moreover, often means having to depend on sources such as population records, manuscript catalogues, or business letters that are designed to avoid just the kind of richness and complexity that cultural historians have sought. Adelman, Dubcovsky, Foy, Millstone, Rachel Van, and Kathleen Murphy, working on topics ranging from American printers to enslaved sailors to East Asian merchants, all feature the term “network” in either their title or their chapter headings. This is just part of a broader, vertiginous rise of network talk throughout the entire profession: a keyword search for “network” within abstracts in history and allied disciplines, via Dissertation Abstracts Online, yields 3,705 individual dissertations. Of those dissertations, 48 are from before 1981; 497 are from 1981–1990; and 1,304 date from 1991–2000. A majority, 1,856 of the total, are from 2001–2012 alone.²⁴

Alongside their emphasis on habitual acts, the second innovative element of the younger scholars’ work is their heightened awareness of the physical and material constraints that shaped how early modern people fashioned themselves and their cultural worlds. This awareness is in part a result of the kinds of topics that have drawn their attention. Transportation in this period was highly sensitive to time, weather, and geography, among other factors. Communications were only as good as the medium of transmission—which in the early modern period, without telecommunications, often came down to transportation as well. These factors did not make meaning all by themselves, but the younger scholars emphasize how profoundly they affected the ways in which early modern people assigned meanings to acts. Jessica Lepler’s work shows how the inefficiencies of early modern information networks helped to spawn financial panics in early-nineteenth-century America. (In her work, indeed, the networks created to facilitate communications turn out to be a straitjacket in times of crisis.)²⁵ Kenneth Loisel notes how important the speed and frequency of correspondence were in creating the social meaning of letters in early ²¹ Caradonna, “The Enlightenment in Question,” esp. 12–13.

²² Easterby-Smith, “Cultivating Commerce,” 173–235, esp. 213–222.

²³ For a useful discussion of new research on the science of habitual action, see Charles Duhigg, The Power of Habit: Why We Do What We Do in Life and Business (New York, 2012), chap. 1.

²⁴ Accessed March 9, 2012. The ratios by decade are similar in the more tightly focused America: History and Life database. This database, which covers only American history, goes back to 1974 and has coverage through 2009. The results are 35 from before 1981; 86 from 1981–1990; 104 from 1991–2000; and 119 from 2001–2009.

²⁵ Lepler, “1837,” chaps. 2–3, esp. 60, 113–114.

modern Europe.²⁶ Ryan Jones notes that “ecological factors” (in his case, in the North Pacific) can help to explain “processes as diverse as human patterns of settlement and European ideas about empire.”²⁷

Restraints imposed by the physical world, however, are less significant to many of these scholars than the ways in which historical actors became stuck in webs of their own making. In a general sense, this is a very old idea, but its prominence in the interpretations of the younger scholars is striking. The scholarly and financial networks that Lepler, Easterby-Smith, and Murphy discuss all created closed communities that had the effect of limiting the intellectual and conceptual flexibility of those who participated in them.²⁸ Brian Rouleau’s work on American seamen abroad suggests that racialized thinking proved hard to escape even for those who traveled the farthest.²⁹ The new generation of scholars reminds us that habits are hard to shake, and that their power often stretches well beyond their usefulness. The specifics differ from field to field, but in each one there is a similar newfound respect for the limitations that historical actors and communities inadvertently create for themselves.

There are echoes of materialism and structuralism in the power that younger scholars attribute to social and physical constraints. The search for underlying patterns of action recalls the structuralist drive to discover frameworks of human thought and behavior. Foregrounding material constraints effects a diminution of individual agency similar to that of structuralist and materialist accounts: boats sink or float, and the drowned do not engage in discourse. Yet the new scholarship eschews the ahistorical, mechanistic formulations with which structuralism has come to be associated. The vocabulary of practice implies that social habits were a structure that constrained historical actors’ volition, but those structures are seen as the product of the actors’ own efforts. Similarly, the new scholarship does not resurrect the discredited conceptual framework by which material realities are bedrock and cultural construction is a light spume playing on the rocks.³⁰

WHY IS IT THAT SO MANY YOUNGER early modernists are turning in a similar direction? The question may turn out to be mal posée. If we follow the lead of the new early modern scholarship, it makes more sense to offer a descriptive account of the turn, emphasizing the “how” rather than the “why.” Since we are dealing with a turn still under way, moreover, it is far easier to observe that something is happening than to explain why it is occurring. We lack the distance we would need to offer a complete genealogy of the turn-in-progress. Let me nonetheless venture two guesses, one internalist and one externalist, about why so many younger scholars are making a ²⁶ Loiselle, “‘New but true friends,’” chap. 3.

²⁷ Jones, “Empire of Extinction,” 18.

²⁸ See citations above and Murphy, “Portals of Nature,” chap. 4, esp. 192–195.

²⁹ Rouleau, “With Sails Whitening Every Sea,” chap. 3.

³⁰ Claude Lévi-Strauss is usually cited as the key structuralist interested in universal frameworks; see, e.g., John Sturrock, ed., Structuralism and Since: From Lévi-Strauss to Derrida (Oxford, 1979), 4–5, 47–48. For a good discussion of the problem of generality in structural analyses, see Lucien Goldmann, “Structure: Human Reality and Methodological Concept,” in Richard Macksey and Eugenio Donato, eds., The Languages of Criticism and the Sciences of Man (Baltimore, 1970), 98–124, here 108–110.

particular turn. Internally, within early modern historiography, many of the most discussed themes during the 1990s and the first decade of the twenty-first century were described primarily in geographic terms: the rise of Atlantic history, a resurgence of Mediterranean studies, the beginnings of global and oceanic history, even the history of borderlands.³¹ This way of thinking about a field, which grouped people and things by place, naturally led younger scholars to be curious about what kinds of ligatures bound together the individuals and objects so collected. Hence the shift toward themes that emphasized practices and processes of connection—and the study of networks in particular.

This cohort also had longer-term forces acting on it that may help to explain why it has proven receptive to the “how” and to histories of process and practice. These are scholars who entered graduate school between the late 1990s and the mid-2000s; most were born in the mid- to late 1970s or early 1980s. That means, in turn, that they were among the first to come of age in a post-Reagan, post-Thatcher, post-Soviet world, in which the dreams of revolution from both right and left (both socialist and Reaganite) had been somewhat deflated. As these future scholars were entering high school or college, they found themselves in an era of small-bore pragmatism about social and political problems. That atmosphere seems to be reflected in their relatively greater interest in concrete questions about how things happened.³²

Recognizing the intellectual and social milieu in which the new generation of scholars was formed, however, raises a question about whether the current turn is a historiographic “moment” as much as it is a generational shift. (Though they share a temporal frame, the metaphor of a “moment” is more inclusive than the idea of a generation, suggesting as it does that scholars at many stages and of many ages are adopting a new approach at the same time.) For instance, some of the most important new work that employs networks as a category has been done by senior scholars.³³ By the same token, histories of visual and material culture were well established before the rising generation of early modernists had entered graduate school.³⁴ Yet

³¹ See, among many others, Bernard Bailyn, Atlantic History: Concept and Contours (Cambridge, Mass., 2005); David Armitage and Michael J. Braddick, eds., The British Atlantic World, 1500–1800 (New York, 2002); Julia A. Clancy-Smith, Mediterraneans: North Africa and Europe in an Age of Migration, c. 1800–1900 (Berkeley, Calif., 2010); Peregrine Horden and Nicholas Purcell, The Corrupting Sea: A Study of Mediterranean History (Malden, Mass., 2000); “AHR Conversation: On Transnational History,” American Historical Review 111, no. 5 (December 2006): 1441–1464. This “geographic turn” has also expressed itself in the form of numerous recent studies of cartography, including Paul W. Mapp, The Elusive West and the Contest for Empire, 1713–1763 (Chapel Hill, N.C., 2011); Neil Safier, Measuring the New World: Enlightenment Science and South America (Chicago, 2008); D. Graham Burnett, Masters of All They Surveyed: Exploration, Geography, and a British El Dorado (Chicago, 2000); and Jordana Dym and Karl Offen, eds., Mapping Latin America: A Cartographic Reader (Chicago, 2011).

³² I do not mean to suggest that this pragmatism was admirable or virtuous. It proved disastrous for crucial social programs and political institutions, from poverty relief to unions. Nor does nineties pragmatism characterize the personal politics of the scholars I discuss here. Another possible interpretation is that the interest in networks and processes reflects the declining power of social class as an organizing principle in both society and scholarship during those same years. For further discussion of the environment in which the younger cohort of scholars was reared, see the discussion in Daniel T. Rodgers, Age of Fracture (Cambridge, Mass., 2011), chap. 6.

³³ This includes David Hancock, Oceans of Wine: Madeira and the Emergence of American Trade and Taste (New Haven, Conn., 2009); and Pierre-Yves Beaurepaire, L'autre et le frère: L'étranger et la franc-maçonnerie en France au XVIII^e siècle (Paris, 1998).

³⁴ See, among many others, Lynn Hunt, Politics, Culture, and Class in the French Revolution (Berkeley, it is very possible for a turn to be simultaneously a moment and a generational shift if—as seems to be the case here—the impact of the new approach is most strongly felt among one cohort of scholars. For those scholars, the “moment” becomes one of their defining generational experiences.³⁵

What, then, of historiographic generation and the turn? At least in scholarship on early modern Europe and North America, neither one is as much a caesura as it might seem at first glance. Generational change is real, but it is often a gentle and even enriching process marked by substantial continuities rather than an abrupt dismissal of what came before. The new generation of scholars who are now entering the profession are turning in new directions, to be sure, but they are not rejecting the questions and preoccupations of those who trained them. The language of turns, recast within this generational model, has much to offer. It helps to name and to demarcate historiographical change—and so helps drive it forward—while also giving us a language for managing the passage of generations.

For the turn to be a useful concept, however, it ought to be redefined to embody two specific qualities. First, as Cook suggests at the end of his essay, we need to employ the language of turns prospectively, to describe and debate change that is ongoing or just beginning. Used retrospectively, as the contributors to this forum show, it risks becoming nothing more than a way of warehousing supposedly outdated concepts. Used prospectively, as a tool to bring into sharper focus trends that are under way or in the process of emerging, it can organize fields and help them advance. Second, turning has to be framed within a non-supersessionist account of generational change: as a process of reinvention and reformulation of what came before, not a wholesale replacement of it. The turn imagined as a sharp about-face can lead only to dead ends, to intellectually barren reversals and re-reversals. Turning conceived of as a more gradual process, however, offers us a much-needed language for intergenerational conversation within the profession. Used in this fashion, that is to say prospectively and dialogically, the vocabulary of turning is worth saving. We should appropriate the idea rather than reject it. That, after all, is what new generations have always done.

Calif., 1984), chap. 3; Pamela H. Smith, The Business of Alchemy: Science and Culture in the Holy Roman Empire (Princeton, N.J., 1994); Paula Findlen, Possessing Nature: Museums, Collecting, and Scientific Culture in Early Modern Italy (Berkeley, Calif., 1994); Robert Blair St. George, Material Life in America, 1600–1860 (Boston, 1988).

³⁵ Alan B. Spitzer, The French Generation of 1820 (Princeton, N.J., 1987), 14–16. I am grateful to Samuel Moyn for drawing my attention to this book.

Nathan Perl-Rosenthal is Assistant Professor of History at the University of Southern California. He received his Ph.D. from Columbia University in 2011 with a dissertation on epistolarity and elite political organizing in the American, Dutch, and French revolutions of the late eighteenth century. He is currently writing a book about Atlantic maritime cosmopolitanism in the revolutionary era.

Featured Reviews

LAUREN BENTON. A Search for Sovereignty: Law and Geography in European Empires, 1400–1900. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2010. Pp. xvi, 340. Cloth $85.00, paper $25.99.

The question “what is the geography of imperial power?” might seem, at first sight, to have a relatively straightforward answer that would rely upon the colors of the imperial map of the world and what they say about territories won, ruled over, and lost. There has been, however, an increasingly thorough interrogation of what might be meant by “geography” encouraged by spatial turns across the humanities and social sciences. As a result, what geography is now understood to be looks little like the favorite discipline of empire, and the territories marked on the map are revealed as only one of many possible representations. There has also been an even more extensive rethinking of imperial power and where we might look for it. The battle for empire has seen military and economic might challenged by the power of discourse, identity, and representation, then by disciplinary power, biopolitics, and embodiment, and, latterly, by increased attention to sovereignty. In her wide-ranging and thought-provoking new book, Lauren Benton has entered this terrain to argue that, viewed from the perspective of law, imperial sovereignty was “not at all consistent with the image produced by monochrome shading of imperial maps” (p. 2). Instead, it was characterized by a range of “uneven legal geographies” (p. xii) that she sets out to explore in detail through examination of European empires between 1400 and 1900.

This book is not, however, a study of the complexity of imperial power for complexity’s own sake, or designed to topple more singular versions of imperial history by demonstrating their inevitable simplifications of the past. Instead, the spatial variations in the relationships between geography and sovereignty that Benton uncovers—“a fabric that was full of holes, stitched together out of pieces, a tangle of strings” (p. 2)—are shown to have been generated by a pair of simple legal principles that were shared by European empires, but worked out in a kaleidoscope of different ways across space. The first principle was that subjecthood was portable: that Englishmen (or Spaniards) should be ruled by English (or Spanish) law wherever they were. The second was that sovereignty could be legally delegated to others. Thus, the working out of the first principle across extra-European space meant “tracing pathways that became conduits for law and even corridors of jurisdiction” (p. 31). The second involved making “centres of delegated legal authority [that] produced irregular and only roughly concentrated zones of control around them” (pp. 31–32). Combined with the ways in which imperial subjects had to deal with the (it is tempting to say “real”) geography of rivers, mountains, coasts, islands, and oceans, and with the reenactment of legal rituals on the hoof in faraway places, this generated a jurisdictional geography of “corridors” and “enclaves.” It is this geography, rather than one of territories and their borderlands, that Benton argues characterized the geography of imperial sovereignty.

The attention to corridors has a watery geography of rivers and oceans. Benton addresses questions of imperial possession, particularly prior to the eighteenth century, in relation to the “distinctive legal geography” of “riverine regions” (p. 103). She argues that claims of sovereignty around the Atlantic were made at estuarine sites where rivers met the ocean and were then extended via up-river journeys. Thus, instead of a history of grand European claims over whole lands and the peoples who inhabited them by proclamation or settlement, Benton presents sovereign claims as fragile lines of flight along river corridors into uncertain interiors accompanied by troubled understandings of how far the Europeans making those journeys were the proxies for their sovereigns or could treat the people they encountered as subjects. As she puts it, “the resulting jurisdictional net was long and thin, spread along river corridors. Holes and tangles made it possible for legal actors to be inside the net at one moment and outside the next” (p. 101). There was, she argues, a set of “structural similarities” (p. 86)—from Africa to the Americas and across centuries and empires—that connected riverine regions and accusations of treason and betrayal.

These river corridors were where sovereignty was both most strongly asserted and most in question.

The spatial figure of the corridor is also used to transform understandings of oceanic space in early modern empires. Here the focus is on the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries and takes in both the Atlantic and Indian Oceans. Attending to the movements of ships, Benton challenges the familiar notion of the ocean as an extra-territorial space over which sovereign claims could not be made. Instead she argues that the oceans were understood as crisscrossed by a tangle of jurisdictional corridors because "ships and their captains moved as delegated legal authorities along intersecting paths, extending corridors of control, in turn weakly or strongly associated with jurisdiction, into an interimperial sea space that could not be owned but could be dominated" (p. 161). This is underpinned by a significant re-reading of the maritime legal theory of Alberico Gentili and Hugo Grotius to argue that the latter was not simply the prophet of Mare liberum in the service of the Dutch Empire's commercial ambitions but also defended the Dutch capture of Iberian prizes by emphasizing the difference between an illegitimate maritime dominion and legitimate claims to jurisdiction over sea lanes. Indeed, prize law, the regulation of privateering, and the (selective) prosecution of piracy are used by Benton to demonstrate the differentiation of sovereignty at sea and the ways in which mariners of all sorts traced out jurisdictional corridors as they moved across the world's waters. She shows, therefore, how jurisdiction over the Indian Ocean's sea lanes came to be regulated by inter-imperial power politics as the Mughal Empire attempted to force European powers to control piracy, while in the Atlantic Ocean regulation was achieved through a complex network of prize courts operating across different empires according to a broadly shared legal regime. This was not quite the law of nations but rather "an international law of the sea as ■ complex tangle of jurisdictional strings" (p. 161).

The enclave geographies of sovereignty are more terrestrial, involving islands and uplands. Benton considers the implications of the expansion of penal colonization, particularly in island settings. In doing so she aims to put transportation to Botany Bay in the context of other empires' use of banishment, transportation, and exile, such as the Spanish system of presidios. She also traces a long history of association between European legal traditions of banishment and island destinations, and between those islands and forms of tyrannical rule. Rule over these colonies was delegated to the military governors who ran them. This system "depended on an understanding of sovereignty that authorized spatial exceptions to institutionalized restraints on the exercise of delegated legal authority" (p. 221). The "layered sovereignty" of empire meant that these regimes might operate under laws different from other places. Benton focuses on the penal colonies of the penal colonies, such as Van Diemen's Land and Norfolk Island (although she does not note that the latter's reforming governor in the early 1840s, Alexander Maconochie, had previously been the first professor of geography at University College London). These were places of punishment for those who transgressed the laws of the places to which they had already been sent for breaking the law, and the relationships between subject, law, and sovereignty had to be different for these places to function as such. But this and other associated forms of delegated sovereignty, such as slavery and forced labor, that put the power of punishment in the hands of others created significant constitutional problems. Jeremy Bentham railed against Botany Bay's denial of the rights of the subject since not only convicts but emancipated convicts, settlers, and indigenous people were brought under what he saw as no legitimate form of law at all. More broadly, the militarized forms of delegated sovereignty that proliferated in these places raised the question of martial law, what William Blackstone, following Matthew Hale, called "in truth and reality no law, but something indulged rather than allowed as law" (quoted on p. 201). Its increasing use meant that these seemingly small spatial and temporal exceptions threatened to undermine the constitutional principles on which all imperial sovereignty was based.

The constitutional threat posed by exceptional spaces was also the outcome of the discussion of imperial hill regions. Benton follows James C. Scott in tracing a real and imagined association of upland regions with a relative lack, judged from the lowlands, of civilization and order. Mountains were "primitive areas with the potential to become increasingly, but never fully, modern . . . zones in perpetual transition." As such, their "kind and amount of law" would be matched to their degree of development, making sovereign functions something that "could be parcelled out and assigned to territories as they developed" (p. 225). These places then became polities and peoples that were simultaneously inside and outside imperial legal orders, holding forms of "quasi-sovereignty" (p. 226), which meant that the application of imperial law routinely required its own suspension. The key example for Benton is the Indian princely states, which numbered in the hundreds and covered more than a third of the area of nineteenth-century "British India." She demonstrates the proliferation of problems of sovereignty and law in and around them, and the contortions into which they threw imperial jurists. Quasi-sovereignty, or what some nineteenth-century jurists, in a remarkable prefiguring of Giorgio Agamben's theoretical terminology, called "bare sovereignty," produced repeated crises of imperial rule.

Taken together these studies of the geography of imperial law offer a serious and sustained challenge to histories that assume a teleological development of the territorial nation state as the assumed space of law and politics. Instead they suggest the pervasive and significant presence of overlapping, partial, and layered forms of sovereignty, and not just in empires, but in states too. Benton's arguments are ones that need to be reckoned with in our many discussions of the geography of imperial and political power and they give real substance to claims from social theory of the importance of sovereignty as an enduring and changing form of power.

Yet there are difficult questions to resolve here too. First, while it is refreshing to find a legal historian engaging so thoroughly and imaginatively with questions of geography, there are unresolved issues about how the abstract spatialities of law relate to the fuller and more material geographies of rivers, oceans, islands, and mountains. How far are those latter geographies (or environments) shaping the action? To what extent can they be discussed as socially constructed, and in what sense? In geography this has been engaged with in relation to the agency of the “more-than-human-world,” but that does not often also involve explicit attention to how that intersects with the sorts of manifestly human-made geographies of something like the law. Benton takes on the difficult task, which most geographers have shirked, of addressing both notions of geography, but it is not entirely clear what the outcome is.

Second, the question of agency is also raised by thinking about what moves this long-term, large-scale history along. Underpinning the historical accounts are notions of inter-imperial rivalry, intra-imperial conflicts, and changing relations between Europeans and others, and there are historical agents of all sorts making decisions. These, however, tend to resolve within the case studies into discussions within which the law takes on something of a life of its own as sets of spatio-legal relations pose structural problems that resolve in complex ways into other forms of law and geography. It remains unclear how the agency that is then attributable to the law itself in the making of this history relates to more long-standing questions of agency in relation to the colonizer and the colonized.

Finally, Benton’s challenge to the hegemony of the imperial map and to the teleology of the territorial nation state is certainly to be applauded. She is also clear that, despite talk of states of exception and bare sovereignty, the theorizations of sovereignty produced by Carl Schmitt and Agamben are not sufficient to explain the historical geography of imperial sovereignty. Schmitt’s division of the world into a European zone of law and an extra-European zone of violence ignores how the latter was also filled with forms of law. Agamben’s invocations of Möbius strips and Leyden jars in an attempt to find a topological figure for sovereignty where the outside is simultaneously inside are too neat to be right. Instead, Benton offers a series of metaphors to try and conjure the geography her cases describe: a mille feuille pastry (borrowed from Henri Lefebvre), “a universe in which contortions like wormholes and black holes challenge our spatial imagination” (p. 287), a tangle of strings, a fabric full of holes, or “complex puzzles of negative and positive space” (p. 38). Most often she simply describes these spaces as “lumpy.” While all these metaphors are useful, the variety is dizzying, the differences between them are as significant as the similarities, and the difficulties of relating these metaphors to the workings of geography and law in practice are considerable. Benton herself notes a problem in finding spatial “concepts that migrate out of monographs, terms that become established parts of the social theory lexicon, or insights that claim the imagination of scholars across fields and become the starting points for new research” (p. 38). It seems clear that if we are off the map in our search for the geography of imperial power, we are also not yet quite sure where we find ourselves. It must be said, however, that The Search for Sovereignty is an impressive attempt to begin treading some radically new paths.

MILES OGBORN

Queen Mary, University of London

AMANDA FOREMAN. A World on Fire: Britain’s Crucial Role in the American Civil War. New York: Random House. 2011. Pp. xxxix, 958. $35.00.

Amanda Foreman’s book is a timely publication during the Civil War’s sesquicentennial. It appears amid a flood of monographs, films, and interactive media that reconsider the war from different perspectives. For example, the American Library Association and National Endowment for the Humanities’ “Let’s Talk About It: Making Sense of the American Civil War” focuses on the war’s impact on Americans. This program is designed for town hall-style discussions in public libraries. Its readings, selected by Edward L. Ayers, encourage conversations about how people chose which side to support; how the war enabled some Americans to cross traditional boundaries of race and gender; what the battle of Shiloh was like for its combatants; how the pivotal battle of Antietam changed the war; and how the Emancipation Proclamation affected African Americans.

Reflecting a shift in scholarship toward “global” thinking, other studies of the war highlight its reach beyond the nation’s borders. New work has compared the Civil War era to other periods of national unification, such as the Risorgimento of the Italian states and the creation of the German Empire. The U.S. slave states, in particular, have been compared to other slave-holding regimes—most of which gave up slavery through far less violent processes—and to other nations coping with military conquest through selective memory of the reasons for their defeat. Americans’ wartime interactions with foreigners through diplomacy, trade, and migration have been traced. Such transnational work has emphasized, for example, the mutual influences of American and European liberal reformers of the mid-nineteenth century, giving new significance to President Abraham Lincoln's claim that the Union stood for "the whole family of man." Scholars have also illuminated how the war affected world history, from its impact on international law and methods of warfare on both sides of the Atlantic to its consequences for the global cotton trade in Asia.

World on Fire is a big book, partly because it thoroughly recounts the Civil War as both U.S. and transnational history, providing a battlefield-level description of the conflict and showing how civilians across the Anglo-American world reacted to the war's news. It begins with a survey of antebellum U.S. politics and Anglo-American relations, emphasizing the critical role of slavery's expansion west of the Mississippi in the war's outbreak. The British government did not really mind American slavery after the abolition of the African slave trade, except when the issue of U.S. territorial expansion threatened Oregon and Canada. British cultural diplomacy helped smooth over potential conflicts, such as the visit of the effusive Prince of Wales in 1860 (foreshadowing wartime British policy, if not popular opinion, the prince did not visit the South). Over some 700 pages the book then depicts the war, using familiar battles, political debates, and home-front tensions as context to demonstrate Britons' widespread involvement. The book ends with a very brief review of postwar Anglo-American diplomatic relations until the 1872 resolution of U.S. claims for damages caused by British-built Confederate warships, in particular the C.S.S. Alabama. The Reconstruction era perhaps lacked the divisiveness or drama of Britons' involvement in the war itself. But Foreman might have explored the British role in postwar America, in light of experiences with post-emancipation society in the West Indies and issues of a racialized empire in India.

Foreman's interest in the Civil War, she reveals, was stirred when, while researching a previous book, she learned that Spencer Cavendish, the eighth duke of Devonshire, traveled with the Army of Northern Virginia in 1862. Charmed by its officers' esprit de corps, he became, as undersecretary of state for war, an advocate for the Confederacy in the British government. But more than showing how liberal Britons reacted to the Civil War, Foreman promises to show how they shaped it—their "crucial role."

There are two important narratives in the book. The first recreates the war through perspectives of nearly fifty British journalists, observers, and volunteers who experienced the conflict at first hand. Foreman seeks to treat each figure as the principal subject of the book in service of telling the story as both biography and history. Foreman's "history-in-the-round" approach brilliantly illustrates how the "British-American world of the Civil War" was "greater and more complex" than we have realized (pp. xxv, xxiv).

Many of the 2.5 million Britons in the United States when the war erupted, about ten percent of them in the South, were simply trapped. Officially, British policy prohibited her majesty's subjects from fighting in the war, yet many did so anyway. Some were victims of ruthless recruiting practices, including outright torture, or the Union blockade. Others, especially Irish volunteers, perceived that fighting in America for either side could help the greater cause of liberating Ireland (the revolutionaries Thomas Francis Meagher and John Mitchel, back from banishment in Australia, fought against each other in the Civil War). Britons in southern cities were particularly vulnerable once the Confederacy began expelling British consuls from the region, while President Lincoln's suspension of the writ of habeas corpus resulted in the imprisonment of a disproportionate number of British subjects in the North. Like the suspicion of the United States now prevalent in developing nations embroiled in civil war, Britain as a foreign superpower was suspected by both northerners and southerners at a moment of profound domestic insecurity.

Of course, some idealistic British immigrants enlisted enthusiastically. Foreman tells the story of the serendipitous Charles Culverwell, who came to America a month after the preliminary Emancipation Proclamation, bringing his training as a doctor and his passion as an actor. He believed America would be "the land of freedom where equality was adored, favoritism abhorred" (p. 379). Obtaining a letter of introduction as a Union military surgeon from P. T. Barnum, Culverwell provided care for runaway slaves in Virginia and wounded soldiers in St. Louis. He then returned to Washington, D.C., to perform (using the name Charles Wyndham) in Hamlet opposite John Wilkes Booth. Meanwhile Culverwell's wife Emma moved to New York City, where their daughter died of cholera amid the New York draft riots. Culverwell served with General Nathaniel P. Banks in Louisiana in 1864 before accompanying soldiers driven insane by the Red River campaign back to New York. Disillusioned, he promptly fled to England, where he pursued a career as a comic actor; his experience in the Union darkened his ideals, if not his sense of humor.

Across North America, however, most Britons sympathized with or helped the Confederacy. Some ridiculed the Union, in the words of The Times of London's editor, John Delane, as "a so-called Power that can scarcely defend its capital against its fellow-citizens" (p. 150). Others wished, somehow, "for the universal abolition of slavery" and for Confederate independence (p. 462). Many, like Devonshire, simply found the South's "laudable cause of self-determination" more compelling than northerners' linkage of "the Union question" with "the slavery question," which he found "most perplexing" (p. 355). Ironically, Britons' confusion about what the North was fighting for foreshadowed many twentieth-century Americans' loss of memory about the Union cause. Yet, Foreman's book, if we take seriously the sympathies for the Confederacy she emphasizes among many British participants, challenges recent interpretations of the war following the appearance of James M. McPherson's Battle Cry of Freedom: The Civil War Era (1988). The last generation of scholarship has tended to show the war as a contest between northern cosmopolitan liberalism—and abolitionism—and southern isolation. Outsiders during the war era did not see the conflict so clearly.

Foreman's second narrative describes the battle of words and memoranda fought among American and British diplomats and politicians over the crucial question of whether the British government would intervene in the war. The book's emphasis on pro-southern opinion suggests that a more popularly responsive British government under Lord Palmerston might have offered to mediate between the North and the South on the basis of Confederate independence. Foreman pays too little attention—only three pages (pp. 395–397)—to the popular surge in support for the Union because of the Emancipation Proclamation. Instead, she focuses on debates in parliament and the British cabinet over whether Britain had a disinterested responsibility to intervene against the “humanitarian crisis” unfolding in the United States; the preliminary Emancipation Proclamation seems to have contributed to this (p. 320). The book also recounts multiple situations in which British lobbyists suggested to Confederate representatives that a renunciation of slavery would virtually guarantee British assistance, but those offers were rejected. Foreman's book confirms that a dogmatic insistence on preserving slavery, even as it crumbled, doomed transnational southerners' claims to international affinity.

The South also profited from provocative U.S. naval actions that the Palmerston government could not ignore. The crisis stemming from the 1861 interception and boarding of the mail ship R.M.S. Trent in the Caribbean to arrest two Confederate diplomats is well known. But Foreman locates the Trent Affair in the context of Canada's nettlesome role in the Civil War: any Anglo-American dispute immediately implicated the huge British colony. Thus the extent of British mobilization in reaction to the Trent seizure makes for sobering reading. Steps included troop deployments to Canada, not only to defend the colony from U.S. invasion but also to conquer the state of Maine, and plans for ships to bombard cities from Boston to Long Island. Canada proved a liability for both countries throughout the war, a “border state” as pivotal as the Union's slave states for arms shipments and vigilantism and as a cell for Confederate terrorist violence in northern cities. As late as February 1865, British planners considered making a pre-emptive strike against the United States for its militarization of the Great Lakes region (p. 740).

Reflecting her emphasis on the crucial roles of important individuals in the war, who barely headed off a nineteenth-century battle of the Atlantic, Foreman explores the special relationship of Secretary of State William Seward and British minister Richard Bickerton Pemell Lyons. Lyons's assignment to Washington was a moderate promotion from his position with the British legation in Florence (the British Empire's most important posts were Paris, Vienna, and Constantinople). While Foreman credits Seward for persuading the Lincoln cabinet to apologize for the Trent Affair, he comes across as grandiose and tempestuous—perhaps as a result of Foreman's adopting Lyons's point of view. The book's title is an adaptation of Seward's warning to William Howard Russell, war correspondent for The Times, that war between the United States and Britain “would wrap the world in fire” and that only Britons would lament the result (p. 122). Lyons played a heroic role in maintaining peace by coaching Seward in how to respond to the complaints of Palmerston and British Foreign Secretary John Russell, and by preparing Whitehall for Seward's threats about the consequences of mounting British arms sales to the Confederacy.

Seward, along with the U.S. minister in London, Charles Francis Adams, and Massachusetts Senator Charles Sumner, were the key advocates of Union policy. As an erudite if humorless friend of British abolitionists, Sumner especially helped sustain Britons' hope that the Union was against slavery, not merely for the nation-state. President Lincoln plays a minor role in the book, appearing as the butt of British newspaper cartoons and wailing over the newest Union casualty reports. Foreman's image of the president wringing his hands after the Union defeat at Fredericksburg and “repeatedly asking, ‘What has God put me in this place for?’” is a profile in pity, not power (p. 349). Admirers of Lincoln will be disappointed that this book implicitly diminishes his significance in the Atlantic world of his day. His fixation on his military commanders' shortcomings and the war's messy domestic politics, including the ambiguous proclamation freeing slaves “as a fit and necessary war measure for suppressing said rebellion,” did not gain Lincoln the attention Britons gave other American statesmen, at least until his assassination. Its shock caused The Times and other hypercritical British presses to confess their bias and at least temporarily salute him and the wage-labor democracy he sought to safeguard.

In the end, this book is mesmerizing, immersing the reader in the diverse participation of the British people in Americans' epic struggle. Yet in giving voice and agency to “competing points of view within a time frame that encompassed multiple simultaneous events,” the book perhaps succeeds too well (p. xxv). It does not clarify what, exactly, Britain's crucial role was in the Civil War. The arc of its narrative, however, allows that role to be surmised. Given the British government's refusal to intercede decisively on behalf of the Confederacy while tacitly allowing British businesses and merchants to supply the Confederacy with arms vitally necessary to maintain resistance to the Union—“60 percent of the Confederacy's rifles, 75 percent of her saltpeter, and 30 percent of her lead,” for example—Britons may be said to have prolonged the Civil War without changing its outcome (pp. 737–738). Surely that is a complicated lesson about imperial interventions relevant to global, not merely Anglo-American, history.

TIMOTHY MASON ROBERTS
Western Illinois University

Reviews of Books

METHODS/THEORY

KERWIN LEE KLEIN. From History to Theory. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 216. $39.95.

Kerwin Lee Klein's book is a series of linked histories of words descriptive of the domain of historical self-reflection: historiography, theory, language, culture, postmodernism, and memory. These histories, spanning the last hundred years or so, are informed by the author's sure grasp of source material that ranges across varied philosophical, historical, and social scientific terrain: Klein is as at home with W. V. O. Quine as Jacques Derrida, with Clifford Geertz as Saul Friedlander.

Chapter one recounts the rise and fall of historiography. Poor old historiography, for all its faults (most notably, a tendency in the wrong hands to impose a glibly progressive sheen to the history of historical practice) was, at its best, the glue that united methodology and philosophy of history in a properly historicized self-understanding. With its demise, historians are left with an unhistorical understanding of their own practice; further, that demise has even encouraged a pervasive anti-intellectualism within the mainstream of the discipline. There is perhaps some truth in this thesis; but Klein's own work, convincingly bringing together historical and theoretical understanding even after historiography's apparent demise, somewhat undermines his claim that he is doing more than tracing the rise and fall of the word historiography. Pace Klein's explicit thesis, the loss of the word does not necessitate the loss of the practice. Perhaps this is why, although Klein regrets the passing of historiography, it is with little more than a metaphorical shrug. The conditions of possibility underpinning historiography have passed, and there is simply nothing that can be done about it.

Chapters two, three, and four work together, jointly covering the development of the theory of history (or the philosophy of history, or metahistory—for to name the subject matter is to take sides in the debates here described) from the early 1940s to the end of the twentieth century. Despite Klein's claim to novelty, these are, in the main, conventional narratives. We read about the carving out of a space for analytic or critical philosophy of history in the 1940s and 1950s, and of its subsequent irrelevance; of the seizure of this intellectual space by an aesthetic, linguistic approach to history in the 1960s and 1970s—insisting that what historians study (culture) and what they produce (historiography) are both forms of text to be rigorously decoded—and of the development of this language fixated approach into the relativistic contortions of postmodernism.

The impassioned argument of chapters five and six provides a welcome counterpoint to the rather bloodless succession of linguistic rises and falls traced thus far. Klein traces the development of memory both within and outside the academy, finding that through this and related words, academic historians have gotten themselves thoroughly entangled in desecularized—or re-enchanted—modes of history. This re-enchantment of history via the Trojan horse of memory follows in the wake of two religious movements: the on-going reaction to the Shoah, as examined in chapter five, and the rise of a politicized Christian conservatism, as examined in chapter six. In that last chapter, Klein leaves the dusty world of scholarly journals and professional conferences, and serves up a gripping story connecting the 1980s epidemic of repressed memories of Satanic abuse, Christian Reconstructionist attempts from the 1960s onward to reestablish the United States as a fundamentalist Christian nation rather than a liberal democracy, and contemporary attempts to overcome supposed elitist anti-Christian bigotry by rereading and thereby reclaiming American public spaces. This is how memory, remembrance, trauma, and repression are deployed in contemporary culture; and it is into this territory that academic historians have blundered in their retreat from scientism and nihilism, producing the strange blend of postmodern theory and sacred language found in "trauma studies." Historians have fled into the primordial, warm embrace of memory seemingly without awareness that the critical, democratic, and cosmopolitan roots of their discipline are thereby under threat.

Klein is a liberal through and through—and not just in his antipathy to the impact of politicized religion on historical practice. Consider Klein's work as measured against Hayden White's well-known rhetorical schema of a historian's mode of explanation, mode of emplotment, and moral position. Klein seeks to explain the rise and fall of his keywords primarily by situating a word in the context of its time, thereby accounting for its "conditions of (im)possibility." His narrative form is satire—historians caught in the changing conditions of their time—even where the subject of that narrative itself represents the world as progressive and romantic (historiography), or as fallen and therefore in need of a fundamentalist return to the beginning (memory). Above all, no matter how bleak things may look for the historical practice, Klein has a liberal's cautious hope for the future, since the one constant is change: "there will be new words."

MARK DAY
Independent Scholar

PERO GAGLO DAGBOVIE. African American History Reconsidered. (The New Black Studies Series.) Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press. 2010. Pp. xviii, 255. Cloth $75.00, paper $25.00.

In this book, Pero Gaglo Dagbovie seeks to add a new paradigm that "focuses on the role, function, and meaning of African American history over time" (p. 11) to a "new black history," while taking a fresh look at a number of longstanding issues and problems such as the scholarship of teaching and learning that are essential to such a study. In search of a new black intellectual history, Dagbovie illustrates the popular and powerful notion articulated by the late John Hope Franklin: "every generation writes its own history." Divided into six chapters, the book offers a refreshing look at African American history from a number of different perspectives, each in its own way central to the author's purpose. For example, Dagbovie takes on the challenging task of unpacking the question, "What is African American history?" and all of the complexities that go along with such an intellectual undertaking.

These issues, of course, have real implications for the future study of African American history. In an especially insightful chapter on approaches to teaching and learning, Dagbovie observes that "African Americanists have not made many noticeable contributions, in terms of publications, to the important field of historical scholarship on teaching and learning" (p. 76). While I agree in the formal sense of scholarship, one could argue that organizations such as the Association for the Study of African American Life and History continue the enterprise started by Carter G. Woodson—whom Dagbovie treats extensively in this volume—that had at its center issues of teaching and learning.

This observation is important, for as Dagbovie makes clear in an equally illuminating chapter entitled "'Ample Proof of This May Be Found': Early Black Women Historians," African American female educators played a crucial role in both the creation and dissemination of African American history. In the process, Dagbovie explores the important, if often undocumented, contributions of African American female teachers, historians, and bibliophiles. Pointing to a deep intellectual tradition among black women educators, Dagbovie artfully chronicles the missionary zeal and deep understanding of the political uses of the past many of these women exhibited in their work. Although not always professionally trained, black female novelists such as Frances Harper used history as a backdrop to advance racial uplift and inspire activism. Even more illuminating is the discussion of Progressive-era black women historians like Washington, D.C. school teacher Laura Eliza Wilkes, who published a monograph in 1919 exploring the military service of African Americans in the nation's early wars but found herself facing perceived sexism.

Dagbovie's treatment of the circumstances surrounding the discovery of an unpublished manuscript by Woodson demonstrates one of the greatest strengths of the book: the author's willingness to wrestle with the complex motivations and obstacles that have confronted and in many ways continue to confront historians of African descent. The desire to produce uplifting historical accounts while adhering to the academy's demand for scholarly detachment is a study in W. E. B. Du Bois's concept of double consciousness. Dagbovie reminds the reader that black scholars have had to balance "their radicalism with scientific scholarship and objectivity as well as their self-imposed social responsibility (as well that imposed by historical context) of representing and defending the masses of their people" (p. 79).

Throughout the book, Dagbovie illuminates two of the questions associated with African American history that go back to its mainstreaming in the 1980s: who owns black history, and who has a right to record and interpret it? In the process, he acknowledges some of the important challenges that go along with evaluating the historic mission and purpose of African American history as defined by early pioneers like Woodson, including how to make it relevant to the lives of the new "millennial" generation often chided for its lack of historical consciousness. In the final chapter, for example, Dagbovie explores the use of genocide as a framework for teaching African American history. At the same time, his re-examination of the literature on the polarizing figure of Booker T. Washington speaks to a longstanding debate among scholars about the virtues and failings of the so-called "Wizard of Tuskegee."

Such formulations and questions make the book a highly informative and engaging read. Rich and concise, it is praiseworthy scholarship and highly recommended.

YOHURU WILLIAMS
Fairfield University

MICHAEL ROTHBERG. Multidirectional Memory: Remembering the Holocaust in the Age of Decolonization. (Cultural Memory in the Present.) Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press. 2009. Pp. xvii, 379. Cloth $70.00, paper $24.95.

This book's fundamental insight is extremely important: that in many cases memory is not a zero-sum endeavor in which public attention to one historical event necessarily detracts from public remembrance of other historical events. Rather, there can be synergies in which awareness of one event increases attentiveness to other, often only remotely related events. Michael Rothberg lays this out clearly and convincingly in the introductory chapter, which should be required reading for seminars on memory. The remaining eight chapters proceed roughly chronologically, focusing on books as diverse as Hannah Arendt's seminal The Origins of Totalitarianism (1951) and Didier Daeninckx's detective novel Meurtres pour mémoire (1984), articles such as W. E. B. Du Bois's "The Negro and the Warsaw Ghetto" (1952) and Marguerite Duras's "Les deux ghettos" (1961), and films as varied as the pioneering cinéma-vérité Chronique d'un été (1961) and Michael Hanecke's tense thriller Caché (2005). Common to all is that they combine references to the Holocaust with analyses of colonialism, especially France's 1954–1962 war against Algerian independence.

This book resembles an anthology of essays, and it would transcend the limits of this review to attempt to discuss all of the eighteen or so works analyzed in depth, a few of which do little to advance the book's main theses or hinge on tenuous connections. A case in point for the latter would be Rothberg's link between Caché and the 1997 trial of Maurice Papon. As a regional police inspector in Vichy France Papon supervised the deportation of 1,600 Jewish children. Later, as chief of police in Paris, he ordered the October 17, 1961 massacre of Algerian protestors, during which the fictional parents of the Algerian protagonist in Caché were killed, providing the historical impulse for the film. As Rothberg demonstrates, memories connect both backward and forward in time, in this case from the 2005 film to the 1961 massacre, to the 1997 trial to the 1942 deportations; the latter two, if my viewing did not overlook them, are wholly absent from the film, while the 1961 massacre is merely implicit. Whether Hanecke himself made the Holocaust connection, or a contemporary French audience would have done so, is unclear. In any case, such bidirectional movements across time are combined with lateral connections between cultures to produce memory's "multidirectionality."

Rothberg's exegesis of these lateral connections begins with Arendt's "boomerang effect" linking European imperialism and Nazi genocide, and with Aimé Césaire's "choc en retour" in his booklet Discours sur le colonialisme (1950). These analyses ultimately lead to the second main argument of the book: that memory is entering a "transnational age" in which Holocaust studies are experiencing a "colonial turn." Publications such as those collected in A. Dirk Moses, editor, Empire, Colony, Genocide: Conquest, Occupation, and Subaltern Resistance in World History (2008), are evidence of this phenomenon (p. 102). Rothberg's third argument emerges in the later chapters of the book: namely, that multidirectional memory operates across generations, with children linking their parents' experiences multidirectionally to other historical traumas.

Instead of going into greater detail about Rothberg's rich case studies—his examinations of André Schwarz-Bart, Charlotte Delbo, and Duras are especially cogent—I would like to extend his core insight about the potential for synergies between memories instead of competition. When does one apply and not the other? In other words, what determines whether one culturally and temporally distinct memory serves as a "screen memory" blocking out another, or whether a multidirectional synergy will occur (pp. 12–16)? The key here, to borrow a theoretical framework from Jürgen Habermas, might be that in a mindset of conventional morality where inflexible rules govern the realm of public recollection, memories are indeed competitive. In a realm of public discourse governed by postconventional, relativistic morality, however, memories can reinforce each other. Thus while the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C. might have begun as a screen memory distracting from memories of genocide and slavery, it has ultimately fostered the creation of a National Museum of the American Indian and a National Museum of African American History and Culture.

Rothberg's epilogue describes the moment of a shift between memory paradigms when both exist side by side: the competitive model pitting victims against each other, and a multidirectional model in which "divergent memories converge," thereby opening up new opportunities (p. 311). He applies this both to the memories exhibited on the U.S. National Mall and to the Israeli-Palestinian dispute. In the latter Rothberg shows how Israeli historian Benny Morris oscillates between conventional and postconventional moral paradigms in his application of Holocaust parallels to the contemporary situations of both Israelis and Palestinians.

Rothberg's insightful definition and explications of multidirectional memory based on the non-competitive, multivalent connections between Holocaust and colonial memories offers an important analytical tool that will open up productive lines of inquiry and understanding in the field of memory studies.

HAROLD MARCUSE
University of California,
Santa Barbara

DOMINIC SACHSENMAIER. Global Perspectives on Global History: Theories and Approaches in a Connected World. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. vii, 331. Cloth $90.00, paper $32.99.

As is the case presently with all fields of learning, the practice of history is increasingly subject to the contradictory impulses of global modernity. The immediate objective of this book is to take stock of the state of "global history" in three societies: the United States, Germany, and the People's Republic of China (PRC). Its broader ambition is "to bring back to the debating table some weighty problems surrounding the nature of historiography as a sociological phenomenon and epistemological endeavor" (p. 6). This aim reflects a new global context in which the increased visibility of contending approaches to the past in different national contexts has complicated the practice of history. Dominic Sachsenmaier's approach is driven by hope in the promise of "global history" despite its many ambiguities. The book represents a valuable contribution to current discussions of history as a way of knowing and an intellectual discipline.

"Global history" as a field offers a strategically effective and challenging medium for raising comparative historiographical questions. Sachsenmaier's rare command of three important bodies of historiography makes him eminently qualified to undertake this task. No less important is his attentiveness to combining "global awareness with local sensitivity" as an indispensable interpretive premise (p. 6). Interest in "global history" has made for unprecedented historiographical commonalities across national boundaries. But meanings and practices differ from one national context to another, sometimes in contradictory ways. These alternatives need to be recognized in their own right if Eurocentrism is to be superseded by a non-hegemonic grasp of historical practice that is the promise of "global history."

Sachsenmaier identifies the United States as the location where the idea of "global history" emerged and has been most conspicuously successful in stimulating novel approaches and institutional innovations. He acknowledges that "it is impossible to clearly outline the parameters of 'global history' as a methodological school, an area of inquiry, or an interest in a certain period," but insists nevertheless that "it is perfectly justifiable to use the term as a marker for a wider academic trend which is actually much larger than the body of literature openly referring to the concept of 'global history'" (p. 72). Its novelty in the present context lies in its challenges to "methodological nationalism" (p. 25), "the spatial assumptions of nation-centered historiography" (p. 26), and Eurocentrism. The "global turn" appears in the spread of interest in extranational and border-crossing phenomena (p. 96). According to Sachsenmaier, "new, creative conceptions of space" do not distinguish global from world, planetary, transnational, translocal, or even comparative and international histories, but "global history—like many other terms—can be taken as shorthand for a larger academic trend in historiography" (pp. 78–79).

The chapters on Germany and the PRC explore how the concept of "global history" has sparked interest in these two national contexts, but has not been nearly as productive as in the United States. In Germany, preoccupation with national history leaves only a marginal space for the practice of "global history," although scholars have done historical work that stresses Germany's relationship to Europe. In the PRC, where interest in the world has been integral to the confrontation with Europe and North America since the nineteenth century, there has been progress toward the development of "global history," but here, too, it is entangled in national concerns and preoccupation with questions of modernity and modernization. Some PRC historians are attempting to use "global history" to bridge the gap between national and world histories that have characterized the organization of the discipline in departments of history.

Sachsenmaier's expansive and diffuse understanding of "global history" enables him to claim for it a questionably broad territory of historical inquiry. The discussion would have been rendered more rigorous by a clearer distinction between "global history" as a subject that enriches our understanding of the past and as a method that characterizes the practices of contemporary historians. The latter would be applicable to historical work at any scale or on any subject, and has far more totalizing implications for the historical discipline. Unfortunately, Sachsenmaier disavows the epistemological implications of current practices despite the evidence for them in the book and, implicitly, in his expansive understanding of "global history."

Sachsenmaier rightly states that the trends associated with "global history" are not of passing faddish significance; "the global turn" in history is part of a larger "cultural turn" in consciousness of globality. That still leaves the reader wondering why the author chooses not to offer a more rigorous explanation of his choice of "global history" over possible alternatives that, by his own admission, would do equally well in capturing these new turns.

ARIF DIRLIK
Retired Scholar,
Eugene, Oregon

DAVID PALUMBO-LIU, BRUCE ROBBINS, and NIRVANA TANOUKHI, editors. Immanuel Wallerstein and the Problem of the World: System, Scale, Culture. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 263. Cloth $84.95, paper $23.95.

In our time, there is a problem with the world, and with our knowledge of it. The volume under review has the merit of most explicitly addressing this problem. To do so, the focus is placed on Immanuel Wallerstein, in whose work the "world" has been central for more than half a century. In a concise introduction, the editors identify two key issues that arise from Wallerstein's ideas. First, they credit Wallerstein with having introduced analysis at world-scale earlier than others, much before the more recent "globalization" debates, but also state that the question of the appropriate "unit of analysis" remains open and may require more nuanced answers than Wallerstein's world-systems theory can offer (p. 3). Second, they argue that Wallerstein's systemic and global approach, with its "fatal disrespect for culture, subjectivity, or difference, or agency, or the local" (p. 5), seems to leave little for the humanities to say. This, more precisely, is the challenge posed to the volume's contributors: to see whether the humanities can fruitfully relate to world-systems analysis today, and by doing so possibly regain more centrality in ongoing discussions about "the problem of the world."

This reader cannot help thinking that the issue is too narrowly defined, confirming the suspicion the editors themselves raise in the introduction. There clearly is a need for scholarship in the humanities to address “the world” from their angle, but even after reading this book there is little reason to think that world-systems analysis can be a resource toward that end. Several of the contributors seem to agree: Wallerstein provides a socio-economic analysis that leaves little space for culture. He offers a strong view on systemic determination that does not allow for contingency. He presupposes a “world” whereas the very constitution of the world might be the necessarily preceding question. That his work is being taken up despite these objections has more to do with self-doubt within the humanities than with the strengths of systems analysis. While there may be persistent diversity of cultural life, this may matter little for the way the world goes. Contingency itself, rather than merely being emphasized in opposition to social-science determinism, may need to be analyzed in terms of degrees and contexts. And the connectedness of human social life may have been demonstrated for too long historical periods to allow for serious doubts about the pre-existence of “world” to our actions.

The editors recognize that Wallerstein’s approach lends itself more to social-scientific than to humanistic analyses (p. 5). In responding to that challenge, however, they leave largely unexplored that which may be the most promising and original alternative: a humanistically inspired social science that is outside of Wallerstein’s own view but ideally suited to address the “problem of the world” with a focus on agency, interpretation, and creativity. The majority of the contributors discuss lacunae in Wallerstein’s approach that become discernible from the viewpoint of the humanities, including questions of law, ethics, and the possibility of critique. But very few of them try to remedy those shortcomings or, to use a different formula, to close the gap between world-systems analysis and the humanities.

To give one example each of a strong chapter and a missed opportunity: Neil Brenner’s exploration of “The Space of the World” provides an excellent criticism of “global territorialist” and “deterritorialization” studies, both of which are seen to work with too strong assumptions about the significance of territory in the contemporary world, and then sketches a program for a study of the “spatialities of social relations” (p. 102). In turn, Tani E. Barlow’s discussion of “The Event of Women and the Modern Girl” draws on highly interesting comparative research on the representation of women in the interwar period (1918–1939), but she frames her presentation with an overdrawn critique of what she calls “regionalism” in world history and an unhelpful recourse to Alain Badiou for conceptualizing “events” in world history. Barlow seems to have only reluctantly accepted the terms of her own comparative cultural research project (p. 163); had she done so more, she might have found that “events” have been conceptualized much more fruitfully, most importantly by William H. Sewell, in the humanistically inspired historical-comparative sociology that, if it were more widespread than it is, could make world-scale analysis amenable to the humanities.

This book addresses a highly relevant topic, but it does not make use of the resources at hand to advance in its exploration. It is true that Wallerstein approached “the problem of the world” earlier than others, but even in his youth he was not the only one to do so, and others have advanced questions and topics more relevant to the humanities. David Palumbo-Liu recognizes that this is the case for Hannah Arendt, who discussed the problem of the world, of the risk of “worldlessness,” in her 1958 Human Condition as “a crisis of language and knowing,” as Palumbo-Liu puts it (p. 206). Brenner interestingly frames his essay by exploring Henri Lefebvre’s concept of mondialité, or “worldness” (pp. 103, 132–133). Closer to our present, one would expect Jean-Luc Nancy’s reflections on mondialisation and “the creation of the world” to be mentioned. There may not be much, there is certainly not enough, but there is more of a discussion of “world” in the traditions of the humanities than this volume, the above exceptions notwithstanding, recognizes.

Why Wallerstein then? One suspicion is that world-systems analysis holds the prospect of offering a critical angle on global developments that the humanistic emphasis on contingency and historicity no longer provides. This topic is explicitly and very fruitfully discussed by Bruce Robbins in the well-titled chapter “Blaming the System,” which confronts Luc Boltanski’s reflections on Distant Suffering (1999) with Wallerstein’s systemic approach (and could be extended using Boltanski’s recent On Critique), but it underlies many chapters and maybe the editors’ intentions. Robbins recognizes that the recent debate on “alternative modernities” (pp. 52–53) may be an intellectual site where such issues could be explored further, but this, too, is an observation to which there is no follow-up.

A final note on small but not insignificant matters: Kären Wigen calls for “incorporating indigenous voices into our work” (p. 152), but this group of U.S.-based scholars seems not to have fully recognized that the “indigenous” are already speaking—an exception being Palumbo-Liu’s discussion of Frantz Fanon. Barlow claims that “the event of women fits Badiou’s description of a universal singular (p. 59, my emphasis), suggesting the subsumption of a case under a category that, it seems, is at odds with the understanding of the humanities that the volume otherwise conveys. Nirvana Tanoukhi’s chapter centrally refers to an essay by Kwame Anthony Appiah (p. 79) but does not give the reference or even the title of this essay. In sum, this is a volume on a highly significant topic into the exploration of which editors and contributors could have invested more.

PETER WAGNER
ICREA and University of Barcelona

COMPARATIVE/WORLD

JEREMY BLACK. Fighting for America: The Struggle for Mastery in North America, 1519–1871. Bloomington: Indiana University Press. 2011. Pp. xvii, 470. $39.95.

Few historians argue that the United States developed apart from the imperialist currents and power politics that have riven Europe for centuries, and Jeremy Black's latest work puts yet another nail in the coffin of American exceptionalism. Black presents a sweeping geopolitical history of the contest among Europeans to control North America, from the landing of Hernán Cortés on the coast to, somewhat surprisingly, the Treaty of Washington in 1871, with which the British finally acceded to the United States' "mastery" of the continent. Black has taken on an ambitious task. Yet he makes clear the utility of a long-term view in demonstrating the political and ideological nature of North American space, and the contingent process by which it is controlled.

Black sails quickly through events of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries as "background" (p. 20). During these centuries, "North America" had not yet evolved into a coherent European construct, and hence Europeans could not contest the continent as a geopolitical entity. The meat of Black's argument thus begins with the Seven Years' War, by which time geopolitical notions about the North American continent loomed large. Black repeatedly emphasizes that North America's fate hinged upon events in other parts of the world. Wars in Europe always bore heavily on the imperial powers' motives and abilities overseas. Following his account of British victory in 1763, Black proceeds through the American Revolution, the Louisiana Purchase, the War of 1812, Latin American revolutions, Native American resistance movements, war between Mexico and the United States, and other pivotal events in North American history. Along the way he makes the case for a spatially and temporally broad geopolitical approach, tempered with the qualification that geography was never destiny. The United States increased its dominion and power only with the help of events that unfolded beyond its shores and beyond its control.

Black's greatest insight is his periodization. From his perspective, the 1860s, not the 1840s, were the most critical and unpredictable era in the international contest over the continent. Instead of granting the United States stable control over a sea-to-sea dominion, the nation's victory over Mexico in 1848 escalated the political debate over slavery and led to the Civil War. Had the political turmoil in Mexico during the 1860s been less severe, Black argues, or had it attracted more attention from across the Atlantic, Mexico may have taken advantage of the power vacuum created by the U.S. Civil War. Similarly, British intervention in the Civil War might have led to a southern victory. Instead, of course, the Union benefited from Britain's tenuous reluctance to intervene and thus had the strength to intimidate Emperor Napoleon III into withdrawing French forces from Mexico. Following the Civil War, Russia effectively withdrew from North America and sold Alaska to the United States. Then Britain pulled out of most of its Canadian garrisons under the Treaty of Washington (1871). After three and a half centuries, the "North American Question" had ceased to be a transatlantic struggle among European powers (p. 350).

Black's effort to "reconceptualize 'American space' from an international perspective" (p. x) complements exciting new work by the likes of Paul W. Mapp and Amanda Foreman. Mapp's The Elusive West and the Contest for Empire, 1713–1763 (2011) recasts the Seven Years' War, in part, as a geopolitical struggle to control the unknown American West, and Foreman's A World on Fire: Britain's Crucial Role in the Civil War (2010) documents the fragile nature of British neutrality during the Civil War. Although these books' arguments are in keeping with those of Black, they highlight a slight flaw of the book under review. The sweep of Black's study is not an unalloyed asset. His quest to cover a long time span sometimes seems at odds with his desire to emphasize simultaneously the contingent nature of events. He sacrifices narrative detail so that he can highlight the larger geopolitical structures at play over a long and complex period. But there is arguably no better way to highlight historical contingency than with detailed narrative. Foreman's book devotes roughly twice as many pages to the critical Anglo-U.S. relationship during the Civil War as does Black to his entire multi-century epic. Without the luxury of a detailed narrative, Black turns frequently to didactic, counterfactual discussion, "because such discussion helped frame the contemporary response to contingencies" (p. 393). As a result, the book reads a bit like an abridged textbook in places. Still, Black succeeds.

JAMES D. DRAKE

Metropolitan State College of Denver

JAMES SIMPSON. Creating Wine: The Emergence of a World Industry, 1840–1914. (The Princeton Economic History of the Western World.) Princeton: Princeton University Press. 2011. Pp. xxxvii, 318. $39.50.

In 2009, the world produced 267.6 million hectoliters (1,013,632,575 gallons) of wine, resulting in the bewildering selection encountered in any well-stocked liquor store. This book is James Simpson's comprehensive analysis of the early stages of the modernization and internationalization of the wine industry that took place between the middle of the nineteenth century and 1914. Boldly venturing beyond the standard regional and national studies, Simpson scrutinizes the shifting dynamics of production and marketing from a global perspective.

The author's fluid writing style and the extensive use of tables and graphs prevent the abundance of hard data from being overwhelming, and the logical structure of the book adds to its readability. Part one opens with an examination of traditional European wine production on the eve of railway expansion and prior to the arrival of Phylloxera, the devastating vine disease.

Simpson focuses on France in his account of the industry-altering impact of Phylloxera, which destroyed the roots of virtually all European grape vines but spurred the development of scientific viti-viniculture. Experimental research led to vineyards replanted with European vines grafted onto Phylloxera-resistant American root stock. These hybrids produced higher yields, but only if chemicals were applied to combat other diseases. Louis Pasteur's breakthrough work on fermentation and the effect of temperature led to modern wineries with cooling systems that halted the fermentation process at the right time. The replanted vineyards and upgraded wineries were capital intensive but far more efficient and productive than the old ones.

Crucially, the scientific and technological breakthroughs made it possible to produce light, inexpensive, yet good wines in hot climates. The production of affordable wines in new supply zones such as the French Midi, Algeria, California, Australia, and Argentina allowed a mass market for ordinary wines to develop. In separate chapters, Simpson covers the specific market forces of each of these zones within the framework of the emerging global marketplace. Despite falling freight rates and improved infrastructures that made distribution over greater distances feasible, international trade in ordinary wines continued to be hindered by protective tariffs and by their spotty quality. In part two, Simpson analyzes Great Britain as a reluctant market for light wines. In a nation of beer and spirits drinkers, the creation of a mass market for wine was further hindered by the inability to prevent adulteration, fraud through mislabeling, lack of consistency, and high import duties. Quality products such as port, sherry, and the best Bordeaux wines remained ■ luxury affordable only to Britain's happy few.

Part three covers the establishment of regional appellations, classifications and branding, and mythical marketing (e.g., Dom Pérignon's creation of champagne). For each region involved in production, Simpson deconstructs the shifting levels of competition and cooperation among the economic factors that determined the profitability of the industry: growers, winemakers, exporters, importers, retailers, and consumers. The political strength of one interest group over another dictated the specific outcomes of these dynamics, with local and national government regulations, subsidies, and tariffs inevitably favoring one part of the commodity chain over another. Institutional innovations, including grower cooperatives and merchant associations, aided the development of protected regional appellations, such as claret, champagne, port, and sherry.

In part four, Simpson scrutinizes the locale-specific opportunities and challenges in California, Australia, and Argentina that led to different organizational structures and levels of vertical integration. California's wines only became a mainstay after early product instability and marketing failures forced a handful of merchants to band together in the powerful California Wine Association. Simpson's account of the impact of nineteenth-century immigration to the New World on global wine production is fascinating. Australia's Anglo-Saxon beer drinkers caused the commodity chain of the country's trade in fortified red wines to stretch around the world to the British consumer market. Argentina, by contrast, benefitted from the influx of wine drinking Italian and Spanish immigrants who created a vast domestic market for light wines.

Statistics drive Simpson's narrative but also put it in proper perspective. In the five-year period 1909–1913, growers and producers worldwide brought 147.6 million hectoliters (559,090,909 gallons) to the market, an average of 29.5 million hectoliters per year. Despite all the changes and innovations in the industry over the course of the nineteenth century, the volume of wine produced in non-European countries (12.3 percent of global production) still paled in comparison with Europe's share of 87.7 percent. France and Italy produced 31.4 and 31.2 percent, respectively. Since then, annual worldwide production has grown ninefold, but, with many more nations competing in a volatile market, the top two's share had by 2009 dwindled to 17.56 and 17.38 percent. The ultimate strength of this book lies in the fact that Simpson treats the specific regional and national developments in the nineteenth century as integrated parts of an emerging global whole.

HENRIETTE DE BRUYN KOPS-RAHUSEN
Georgetown University

JIMENA CANALES. A Tenth of a Second: A History. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 2009. Pp. xii, 269. $35.00.

This book offers an account of nineteenth-century observation and measurement in astronomy, physics, engineering, physiology, and psychology. Using a tenth of a second as a reference point, Jimena Canales traces attempts to conceptualize and measure short time spans. The book approaches the tenth of a second from two perspectives. It examines the techniques and practices of measuring, observing, and visualizing that were used to capture fractions of seconds as well as reflects on the meaning of this short time interval. Canales seeks to demonstrate the immense importance of the tenth of a second for nineteenth-century science and culture. According to her, the tenth of a second is constitutive of modernity (p. ix); her aim is to understand the tenth of a second as modernity (pp. ix, 14).

One pervasive theme throughout the book is the career of the "personal equation." Most chapters touch upon the question of how scientists dealt with the insight that different observers process sensory information differently. The book thus provides a fine account of how the conception of the personal equation traveled across disciplines, how it was being interpreted, and how reaction time studies along with new instruments and technologies were devised to better control the phenomenon.

The personal equation first became an issue in astronomy. Extending her own previous work as well as work by Simon Schaffer, Christoph Hoffmann, and others, Canales examines the origins of concerns with the tenth of a second in debates about the personal equation. Canales charts the move from measuring the speed of sensation through reaction time measurements to interpretations of reaction time measurements as measurements of the speed of thought (chapters two and three). Machines for transit observations, the chronoscope, and photography opened up new ways of managing the problem of personal differences among observers that led to new experiments. But as Canales's account nicely shows, if we look closely at the debates surrounding the uses and merits of these techniques, we do not find a simple technological success story.

Chapters four and five demonstrate that these instruments and techniques had their own limitations and that the problem of individual differences in measurement could not be completely overcome. In particular, the diverse outcomes of transit observations created substantial controversy, and artificial transit machines could not settle debates. Were the discordant results due to the individuality of the observers? Were the instruments to blame? Were the phenomena themselves strange? Similarly, in the early days of photography and cinematography, these visualization techniques raised high hopes because they were thought to have the potential to overcome the limits of the eye, which cannot capture intervals shorter than a tenth of a second. But again, the apparatuses produced diverse outcomes. The different cameras that were used to capture the transit of Venus yielded different images, and the discrepancies could not be satisfactorily resolved.

The last two chapters take the story into experimental and theoretical physics. In chapter six, Canales argues that the development of new techniques of precision measurement in late nineteenth-century physics, notably interferometry, can best be understood as a response to concerns with the problem of personal differences and "personal error." Chapter seven charts the debate between Alfred Einstein and Henri Bergson about time and relativity. Canales demonstrates how contemporaneous concerns with precision measurement in physics and the psychology of perception drove these debates.

In my view, the book is strongest where it focuses on the actual practices and interpretations surrounding the personal equation and reaction time measurement. I am, however, less convinced by the larger claims in the introductory and concluding sections about the tenth of a second as constitutive of modernity or the sweeping statement that the tenth of a second was a driving force for twentieth-century "anti-positivist" philosophy and science studies. To me, the emphasis Canales puts on the tenth of a second appears seems oddly misplaced. This book really is a book about the career and repercussions of the personal equation, and as such, it is very intriguing.

JUTTA SCHICKORE
Indiana University,
Bloomington

JESSICA B. TEISCH. Engineering Nature: Water, Development, and the Global Spread of American Environmental Expertise. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 2011. Pp. 260. Cloth $65.00, paper $27.50.

Jessica B. Teisch's book is a valuable survey of the global reach of American technical and entrepreneurial expertise in the decades around the turn of the twentieth century. Dreams of progress drew environmental experts and entrepreneurs to join, plan and oversee, or consult on mining projects, sugarcane plantations, and irrigated colonies in Australia, South Africa, Hawai'i, and Palestine. Linking Teisch's experts were California connections: official positions as city, state, or federal engineers, entrepreneurial projects in the San Bernardino Valley, and prestigious ancestors among the Forty-niners. Several modeled their contributions in California on observations made of India's irrigation systems and drew on British expertise, justifying the "global spread" claimed in Teisch's subtitle. Important also is Teisch's insistence that the expertise carried from California around the world was not merely technical, for it entailed a vision of progress that went "hand in hand" (p. 6) with racial subjugation.

Two uses of water connect the stories: water for mining and water for irrigation. British engineer Robert Maitland Brereton learned from experience with Indian irrigation systems the necessity of central ownership and administration. In the 1870s, he lobbied the U.S. Congress for a federal irrigation survey on behalf of California canal companies. George Davidson wrote the survey's report, traveled to India to examine connections among water systems, water users, and the state, and then returned to support California's creation of the office of state engineer in the wake of the disastrous choking of the Sacramento River by mining debris. William Hammond Hall got the post, and he later joined cousin John Hays Hammond in providing water for the mines and cities of South Africa. The brothers George and William Benjamin Chaffey built irrigation colonies in southern California and then Australia, which influenced the work Elwood Mead took up, assisting the development of similar settlements in Hawai'i and Palestine from his position as professor of rural institutions and irrigation at the University of California, Berkeley. Mead assisted in the failed attempts of the Hawaiian Home Commission to make Hawaiians more American by transforming them into yeoman farmers; Hammond was sentenced to death for treason by London's High Court for his role in an armed uprising against the Transvaal government.

The value of Teisch's book lies in its reach, in the colorful stories that embroiled technical experts and the far-flung and exotic locales to which they were drawn in their quest to remake both nature and society. Although the professional practice of engineering is one of Teisch's topics, it is often not clear what sort of engineering is under discussion. The timeframe of the book includes the important period of American engineering professionalization, in which engineers became jealous of whom they allowed to carry the label and in which engineers moved increasingly toward formal and often scientific education and away from shop-floor and job-site training; Teisch describes instead a move in a somewhat opposite direction, away from “the scientist-engineer of the nineteenth-century” and toward the managerial expert of the twentieth (p. 24). “Scientist-engineer” more accurately describes a nineteenth-century practitioner from France or Germany than from the United States; Hammond, trained at Freiberg University, may legitimately bear such a label, but he is an exception.

Different kinds of engineers developed different identities and allegiances during this period: civil engineers had different connections with government and the state than did mining and mechanical engineers, for whom commercial and industrial connections remained most important, and only very few in any field became managerial experts. The difficulty may stem from Teisch’s reliance on the literature of environmental history rather than the history of engineering, citing environmental and western historians on the transformation of American engineering, for example, rather than making more use of Edwin Layton’s seminal study of engineering professionalization and public service, which appears only in the closing pages. Precision in identifying engineers and explaining why they were so identified would have strengthened an inherently interesting book.

JENNIFER KARNs ALEXANDER
University of Minnesota

DAVID STEVENSON. With Our Backs to the Wall: Victory and Defeat in 1918. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press. 2011. Pp. xxi, 688. $35.00.

How did World War I end, and why? Did the Allies win or did Germany lose? What brought about that outcome: military victory or collapse through attrition? If belief in victory faltered in Germany and among the other Central Powers (Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey), was this the fault of the Fighting Front or the Home Front (as nationalists and the defeated generals asserted almost immediately in Germany)? And what form did the war’s end take? Were the succession of armistices, and especially that of Germany with the Allies on November 11, 1918, the same thing as surrender? What relation did they bear to the treaties signed the following year? These are all fundamental questions, yet none has received the same attention as other classic questions posed by World War I: who or what started it, and why did it result in a new world war twenty years later?

Perhaps this is because World War I’s end in 1918 has been treated above all as a matter of military history. In practical terms, this emphasis has meant a focus on tactics and operations against the backdrop of a deadlocked battlefield. All too often this approach is situated within the framework of a single nation, as evidenced by a certain British historical obsession with how the British army “won the war.”

Stevenson’s magisterial study has changed the subject at a stroke. It applies an analytical framework of the sophistication self-evidently required to assess the origins and outcome of the war for the first time to the end-game itself, so providing answers to the questions above with a new cogency and clarity. Remarkably, this is the first history of the military events of 1918 to use the sources and languages of all four main contenders on the Western Front—Germany and France as well as the British Empire and the United States—and to view the fighting as the truly interactive business it was. Its also encompasses the other fronts, in Italy, the Balkans and the Middle East. Stevenson incorporates into his analysis logistics and intelligence—those unseen hands sustaining combat—and the even more vital conflict that took place on (and below) the oceans as Allied ships defeated the U-boat menace in the Atlantic Ocean and the Mediterranean. Yet since like all wars, the Great War ultimately turned on will power (never enough on its own, but crucial to the winning mix of factors), victory was also shaped by the economic resources, social cohesion and political legitimacy that each camp variously disposed of. In short, by taking the turbulent last year of the war as his subject, Stevenson offers an interpretation of the preceding years and thus of the war as a whole.

Argued in precise prose but also able to produce the telling metaphor, the book deploys a powerful notion of a “race to the bottom.” Caught in the giant entropy of a war no one had anticipated, the winners managed to husband the essential resources and delay the process of decline sufficiently to gain the edge that determined the outcome. This entailed both the “learning curve” on the battlefield—that combination of hardware (tanks, aircraft) and tactics (counter-battery artillery fire, specialist assault units) that began to tilt the balance of advantage away from the defensive—and also the superiority in material resources enjoyed by the Allies (with the exception of defeated Russia) owing to their command of the oceans and access to the global economy. In the end, however, Allied tactics and battlefield learning were not sufficient to ensure victory.

As Stevenson notes, the defensive scramble mounted by the British and French against the spring offensive in 1918 sapped the German will to win at least as much as the subsequent Allied advances of the final “hundred days.” Behind both lay the relative Allied advantage in military equipment, economic resources, domestic living standards, and political legitimacy as wartime democracies came into their own.

The USA was the ultimate resource both on and off the battlefield. Counteracting entropy in 1918, it gave the Allies an unanswerable advantage. But as Stevenson shows in his compelling final chapter, the war’s conclusion came with a twist. If the British and French insisted on harsh terms that sought to make the armistice a total surrender, the Wilsonian vision of a non-punitive and non-expansionist peace meant that the peace settlement proved to be anything but that.

JOHN HORNE
Trinity College,
Dublin

STEFAN GOEBEL and DEREK KEENE, editors. Cities in Battlegrounds: Metropolitan Scenarios, Experiences, and Commemorations of Total War. (Historical Urban Studies Series.) Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate Publishing Company. 2011. Pp. xi, 239. $124.95.

This collection seeks to bring into dialogue two fields that have experienced enormous change in recent years: urban history and the cultural history of war. While urban history and its institutional home, urban studies, have a reputation for nitty-gritty social history and demographics, the cross-pollination of cultural geography, anthropology, and spatial theory have changed the boundaries of "traditional" urban history and broadened its focus. Likewise, the study of warfare has ranged broadly across different methodological approaches in the past two decades, embracing cultural theory especially. The essays published here try to reconcile these transformed fields in the profession, with somewhat uneven results. Most of the essays provide useful and fresh approaches to their specific topics, and it is important to note that these essays represent a wide geographic area and multinational authors, for which the editors should be applauded. In their introduction, Stefan Goebel and Derek Keene write that the thematic focus of the book is threefold: "scenarios—experiences—commemorations" (p. 4), with an emphasis on war as a disaster in urban life that threatened notions of modernity and "civilization." However, there is another organizing dichotomy that may be more useful to readers; most of the essays focus either on the city as it is imagined in the twentieth century, or on the city as a locus of action and reaction to war, nationalism, and memory. Of these two strands, the second comes closest to fusing the themes of war and the city.

Contributors focusing on the city as imagined battlefield rely more heavily on literary and visual representations of the city, and interestingly, they find that cities do not have to be real to have power in shaping discourses of war. Susan R. Grayzel's work on the air war in Britain (chapter two), for instance, makes a persuasive argument about the ways in which H. G. Wells raised the specter of war in the city for Britons. His prescient writing about air raids before World War I and his interwar film about terror helped to construct a story about the ways in which war destroyed not just buildings but the foundations of civilization itself. Meanwhile, Eyal Ginio's contribution on the Ottoman city of Edirne explores the ways in which a city can be shaped by narratives of revenge, redemption, and cultural unity in the aftermath of war (chapter five). Ginio shows how the Balkan Wars set the stage for the national narratives following Gallipoli and the population exchanges of the 1920s. In fact, Edirne functioned as a place for crystallizing many of the ideas and fears facing Ottoman elites. As with Grayzel's and Ginio's work, all the chapters that focus on the imagined city explain how the lines between real city and artificial construct become blurred with the onset of war and most especially in the memory of war. One of the important points the book makes is that historians need to probe those slip-pages.

Perhaps the most innovative contributions in this collection come with the examination of the ways in which the local reaction in a city shapes a larger national, imperial or global dialogue. Tim Cole (chapter eight), in a comparative study of Warsaw and Budapest, uses urban history methods to examine how these two metropolises reacted to and shaped the national policies of ghettoization during World War II. He incorporates cultural geography, social history, cultural studies, and political history to find that while each city had major differences in their ghetto stories, their decisions about how to construct those ghettos relied on remarkably similar negotiations with Jewish and non-Jewish populations. Cole's essay is a model of the kinds of integrated scholarship the editors aimed for in the book. Other important contributions to the thorny question of how local lives in urban centers react to international (and total) war come from Maureen Healy's examination of Viennese internal enemies (chapter seven) and Jovana Knežević's exploration of the role of rumor in wartime Belgrade (chapter six). Taken together these three essays bring the four cities to life and make the complexities of metropolitan settings during catastrophe quite apparent.

Finally, several of the authors address the broad question of remembrance of war, looking not only at commemoration but at the ways in which modern media try to forge connections between current events and those of the past. Goebel (chapter ten) and Lisa Yoneyama (chapter eleven) take two cities targeted by bombing during World War II, Coventry and Hiroshima, and pick apart the ways in which city leaders and other stakeholders helped make these cities into international symbols. The intimate decision making about what to replace, what to destroy, and what to highlight gave power to cities that had been rendered powerless by wartime destruction. However, in recreating their cities as international icons and symbols, urban leaders also risked losing their local identities and perhaps their local control.

Generally, this collection attempts to challenge the traditional divides in academic worlds and does so with great attention to the nuances of gender, nation, and local life. Scholars interested in the emergence of air warfare and bombing of civilian populations will find the book particularly interesting given the large number of essays that treat this issue, either as a central point or peripherally. Urban historians likewise will find the essays useful as a fresh way to conceptualize the ways in which war defines cities, through occupation, destruction, reorganization, and even prediction. The essays are all rather short, which leads me to assume that many may have originated as conference papers, but several are excerpts from forthcoming books, so they serve as a nice preview of things to come.

TAMMY M. PROCTOR
Wittenberg University

RONALD IAN HEIFERMAN. The Cairo Conference of 1943: Roosevelt, Churchill, Chiang Kai-shek, and Madame Chiang. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland & Company. 2011. Pp. vii, 199. $45.00.

Allied forces assigned to the China-Burma-India (CBI) theater during World War II often felt neglected, caught up in what aggrieved British veterans still call "the forgotten war." The absence of a rich body of historical literature reflects this sentiment. Ronald Ian Heiferman's pioneering full account of the Cairo Conference of November 1943, attended by President Franklin D. Roosevelt, Prime Minister Winston Churchill, and Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, is therefore a welcome as well as an impressive addition.

The Cairo Conference's origins lay in Roosevelt's belief that some ego-stroking gesture was necessary to address Chiang's long-simmering resentment that he, and more generally the Chinese theater, were not being treated with appropriate seriousness. Cultural confusions abounded, but the root problem was structural and strategic. Chiang had long hoped that the major Allied effort against Japan would come through Burma, connecting the Allies with his isolated regime in Chongqing. The war would then be fought to victory in mainland China. The Americans gave some help but, fully aware both of the formidable mountain and jungle terrain and the inhibiting Japanese entrenchment in northern Burma, chose to fight their war against Japan in the Pacific. The Chinese effort, lamentably passive as it seemed to many U.S. observers, was valued simply as a "holding action" that kept the bulk of Japan's forces (Heiferman suggests one million men but some estimates are higher) locked up in China.

Heiferman's admirably comprehensive treatment and objective analysis, which brings a wide range of relevant personalities and causative factors into sharp focus, suggests a two-level conference. At the top we see a highly personalized "relationship" diplomacy—an art form favored both by Roosevelt and also by Madame Chiang Kai-shek on her brilliantly successful tour of the United States in early 1943. Roosevelt flattered the Chinese leader, promising full support for China's postwar ambitions and offering ingratiating critiques of British conduct.

At a lower level the leaders and military chiefs grappled with an operational plan designed by Chiang's U.S. adviser, Joseph Stilwell, to break down Japanese power in northern Burma. The Chinese would advance from the northeast with supporting action by Allied (mainly British) forces from the west. Both Chiang and Churchill felt obliged, in meetings with the watchfully suspicious Americans, to support the campaign in principle. Neither appears to have been sincere and prolonged bouts of shadow-boxing led inexorably to a stalemate. Chiang demanded, as an absolute condition of any Chinese action, a simultaneous British military advance as well as naval efforts in the Indian Ocean to frustrate any Japanese reinforcements. Churchill promised a British fleet in due course but would give no date. Surely, he argued, the numerically superior land forces at hand would suffice. But Chiang refused to compromise and then raised another hurdle, this time insisting upon significant increases in supplies delivered by U.S. planes over the mountainous southern approach to China. The Americans balked at the request, pointing out that there would in fact have to be a temporary reduction in existing schedules in anticipation of the buildup for the proposed Burma campaign. Eventually, the conference compromised and approved Operation Buccaneer, a less ambitious amphibious operation in the Andaman Islands aimed at gaining control of the Bay of Bengal. Roosevelt gave Chiang a pleasing communiqué promising the return to China of all Chinese territory occupied by Japan since 1895.

In the end, however, Heiferman's account leaves little doubt that the Cairo Conference was, except at the level of propaganda, a failure. For upon their return to Egypt after their intervening meeting with Joseph Stalin, which committed the western Allies to the invasion of France, Churchill was able to persuade Roosevelt that even Operation Buccaneer should be abandoned in deference to the now compelling needs of Operation Overlord. Roosevelt then had to explain this reversal to Chiang, who responded angrily, warning that Free China might not survive. He seized the moment to ask for a one billion dollar grant. Roosevelt refused. He had now lost faith in Chiang (though public cordiality was maintained) and began to cultivate more promising connections with the Chinese Communists. Thus everyone came out badly, even the British whose sense of euphoria in blocking action in the CBI theater soon faded as the Americans refused to endorse the alternative Mediterranean operations that Churchill had wanted all along.

As to the long-term consequences, Heiferman, noting Roosevelt's post-Cairo disillusionment and skepticism about Chiang's chances of postwar political survival, aptly emphasizes the dangerous political confusion that resulted from Roosevelt's failure to convey his transformed assessment to Vice President Harry S. Truman, or indeed to the American public (p. 168).

FRASER J. HARBUTT
Emory University

STEPHAN FEUCHTWANG. After the Event: The Transmission of Grievous Loss in Germany, China, and Taiwan. New York: Berghahn Books. 2011. Pp. 240. $95.00.

This is an arrestingly important work. It contains the complex reflections of a seasoned researcher on a key dilemma of the twenty-first century: how to pass on the meanings of historical trauma from generation to generation. The transmission of grievous loss will happen anyway. The question is how to make this process both more artful and more meaningful, so that we may indeed move beyond the grief and grievance that is our legacy from the bloody twentieth century barely behind us.

Stephan Feuchtwang is uniquely qualified to write about this weighty subject; he has been engaging the comparative literature on history and memory for over four decades. Therefore, he has been able to add something truly new to the large corpus of scholarship that began with Maurice Halbwachs's explorations of collective memory and grew to encompass the works of Jacques Le Goff, Pierre Nora, and Patrick Hutton, just to mention a few of the researchers working in this field. Feuchtwang's questions go beyond memory and memorialization to the more subtle mechanisms through which different cultures pass on the experience of loss both in the public and in the personal realms.

His book honors distinctive voices, not the least being his own as a child refugee from the horrors of the Shoah. The grandson of the chief rabbi of Vienna (who had been accorded Jewish honors and official recognition when he died in 1936, before the horrors of Nazism totally engulfed his community and his country), Feuchtwang wrestles with the uniqueness of the Holocaust in a thought-provoking, comparative context. While other writers—most notably Ian Buruma in The Wages of Guilt: Memories of War in Germany and Japan (1994)—also deploy a wide range of linguistic and analytical skills to reach across cultures, this particular researcher brings a depth of engagement that makes this book utterly unique. It combines interview work and field notes with an impassioned concern with how Jews, Chinese, and Germans continue to express an ambivalent relationship to historical trauma decades after memories are assumed to have been put to rest.

This book is unabashedly about apples and oranges, as it were. How can one possibly compare the murderous policies of the Shoah to the political consequences of China's Great Leap Forward, or the Nationalist Party's repression of a small band of leftists in Taiwan after 1949? The numbers themselves are incommensurate: six million Jews killed in Europe; thirty-six million dead from starvation and political repression in Mao's China; "only" 164 communist sympathizers disappeared in the small hamlet of Lukou. Feuchtwang gives us the figures, as well as the courage—and a methodology—to elicit shared meanings from totally different historical contexts. He makes subtle distinctions between targeted violence and politically motivated indifference to human suffering on a large scale. He is also careful not to use or assign the language of victimization to the different individuals whom he (and his research assistants in China, Taiwan and Germany) sought out. The goal is to listen and thereby create a framework in which strategies for the transmission of grief gain meaning across time and space.

In this project, Feuchtwang's own fieldwork from 1968 becomes a springboard for a return to Taiwan in 2011. Forty-three years later, the author is not only much older but has been building an edifice of questions based upon extensive readings and interviews on the Chinese mainland as well as in Berlin. In China, Yang Jisheng's monumental study from 2009, Mubei (Memorial Tablet), allows Feuchtwang to begin to fathom the weight of unassuaged loss that followed the great famine of 1958–1960. In Germany, the collection of interviews from the 2002 study entitled Opa war kein Nazi (Grandpa Was No Nazi) provides a base line from which more personal voices and experiences emerge, so that readers are brought into the intimate world of Berliners seeking to recover some sense of Heimat unsullied by Nazi memories.

Through the book's keen focus on disparate ways of "historical repair," the author manages to highlight both public policy changes as well the personal strategies that lead individuals to, literally, back into historical memories. As a result, we are able to envisage both victims and commemorators alike as "ghosts"—fragments of a lived experience that hovers on the edges of public remembrance, reminding us of what is still unspoken, singular as well as intimately familiar. It is, therefore, no poetic exaggeration to conclude (as Feuchtwang does) that each of us has become a site where ruins reign, where grief speaks mutely. On this terrain, the study of history meets its greatest challenge: to give voice to the unspeakable by listening to what lies buried in cultures and languages flung far from our own loss.

VERA SCHWARZ
Wesleyan University

SARAH B. SNYDER. Human Rights Activism and the End of the Cold War: A Transnational History of the Helsinki Network. (Human Rights in History.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. x, 293. $85.00.

Sarah B. Snyder brings together two debates—how to understand the rise of human rights movements and the fall of the Soviet empire—with a fresh look at the way human rights activism, unexpectedly unleashed by the inauspicious Helsinki Accords of 1975, hastened the collapse of the Soviet bloc. The book presents a detailed account of the two and a half years of negotiations within the framework of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE) that produced the Helsinki Final Act, an unlikely agreement among thirty-five nations that was originally conceived as a Soviet project to gain international ratification of postwar boundary arrangements and the principle of nonintervention, thereby protecting its sphere of influence. "If Helsinki is held, then I can die," Soviet Premier Leonid Brezhnev reportedly remarked, showing that the Soviet leadership regarded its initiative as crucial to national security (p. 24). Snyder draws on extensive archival research in the United States, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary, supplemented by interviews with some of the principals, to produce an account that specialists will find a valuable addition to work by Padraic Kenney on the grass-roots revolutions of 1989 and work on the history of human rights by Samuel Moyn (one of the series editors for the present volume). Snyder demonstrates how a combination of diplomatic wrangling and pressure from below wrested the agenda away from Soviet control and transformed an agreement about borders and sovereignty into a promise to allow international monitoring of internal human rights conditions. It was a promise of great consequence.

If Brezhnev hoped that the Helsinki process would forever enshrine Soviet domination of Eastern Europe, Secretary of State Henry Kissinger dismissed the whole enterprise as “meaningless,” in line with his realist doctrine: “No matter what goes into the final act, I don’t believe that the Soviet Union will ever do anything it doesn’t want to” (p. 32). Snyder carefully documents how both men were proved wrong as the Helsinki process took on a life of its own, surprising Soviet leaders and American cynics alike. Other international agreements such as the 1948 United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights had been ignored. What made the Helsinki Accords relevant was a clause stating that CSCE members could exchange views on its implementation. That provision formally made human rights an international concern, and, as Snyder demonstrates, opened a political space that Western governments and non-governmental organizations on both sides of the Iron Curtain widened.

Kissinger did his best to make his prophecy self-fulfilling, sidelining CSCE to the point that U.S. diplomats yearned for instructions. He was eventually outflanked by the U.S. Congress, which frequently played a substantive role in making foreign policy during the 1970s. Legislators insisted on the creation of a joint congressional-executive Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe headed by Representative Dante Fascell (D-FL), a noted human rights advocate. The Fascell Commission kept a spotlight on human rights NGOs, political prisoners, and refuseniks during the years of Kissingerian neglect. Yuri F. Orlov, Anatoly B. Shcharansky, Yelena Bonner, and other founders of the Moscow Helsinki Group worked closely with the Fascell Commission to publicize violations. Helsinki monitoring groups sprang up in Poland and Czechoslovakia, becoming a network of grass-roots organizations.

President Jimmy Carter took up the issue out of the dual conviction that it was a moral imperative and would strengthen the Democratic Party with “ethnic” voters. He had campaigned against what he called Helsinki’s approval of the Soviet takeover of Eastern Europe. Once in office, he found the accords useful for challenging the Soviets on their treatment of dissidents. Ronald Reagan similarly saw the CSCE as a stick to beat the Soviets with, then was surprised to find Mikhail Gorbachev increasingly willing to discuss human rights in exchange for cooling anti-Soviet rhetoric. Snyder narrates the Gorbachev policy of glasnost largely as the product of Western demands. However, she acknowledges that Gorbachev’s reforms had gone much further “than was required by external pressure” by the end of Reagan’s second term (p. 215).

The Helsinki Final Act endorsed international monitoring of the treatment of Eastern dissident groups and human rights activists, while encouraging a dramatic increase in their activities and launching Western NGOs such as Helsinki Watch that gave them a modicum of protection and kept the issue on the international diplomatic agenda. Václav Havel once flattered Helsinki Watch: “I know very well what you did for us, and perhaps without you, our revolution would not be” (p. 226). The Helsinki process, far from preserving the system Brezhnev thought would be his legacy, catalyzed the transnational network of human rights activists, their Western supporters, and reformers headed by Gorbachev into an unwitting coalition that ended the Cold War. When the Berlin Wall fell, to paraphrase Reagan hagiography, it was because they pushed it.

MAX PAUL FRIEDMAN
American University

JAMES SIEKMEIER. The Bolivian Revolution and the United States, 1952 to the Present. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 210. $64.95.

This book is a welcome update to the history of Bolivian-U.S. relations. James Siekmeier argues that U.S. policymakers eschewed the use of force and instead opted for economic assistance to Bolivia because they believed it would be the most effective way to maintain positive relations. Likewise, Bolivian leaders understood U.S. concerns about communism during the Cold War and were active players in eliciting U.S. aid and crafting “workable compromises” with the U.S. government. As Siekmeier points out, recent comments by Bolivia’s President Evo Morales, who called upon South American leaders to oppose the Free Trade Area of the Americas, while tapping a deep well of resentment, overstated the influence that the United States exerted on Bolivia going back to 1952. Indeed, during the Cold War, Bolivia was mostly able to get what it wanted from the United States—particularly economic assistance.

Siekmeier’s book updates scholarship on Bolivian-U.S. relations in three ways. First, it takes advantage of more recent scholarship and declassified documents to examine foreign relations in the 1970s. Second, it does an excellent job of treating the cultural, social, and political transformation of Bolivia between 1952 and the present. Finally, this book gives perhaps the definitive word on the Bolivian Revolution and shows how that seminal event affected relations between the United States and Bolivia through the 1970s.

Particularly noteworthy is Siekmeier’s treatment of Victor Andrade Uzquiano, Bolivia’s ambassador to the United States at various times between 1944 and 1962. Perhaps more than any other recent scholar, Siekmeier emphasizes Andrade’s use of charm, knowledge of U.S. culture, and diplomatic skills to secure a near continual stream of aid to Bolivia during his time as ambassador and in the years subsequent to his tenure. Indeed, Andrade’s role cannot be understated, given that most key players in Washington who knew him were positively inclined toward him. Siekmeier uses Andrade's example to show that a combination of anticommunist rhetoric and skillful diplomacy could have a lasting positive impact on Bolivia's relations with the United States. Other ambassadors and diplomats garnered less impressive results. Historians of U.S. foreign relations should emulate Siekmeier in focusing on particular diplomats during the Cold War and analyzing their skill sets and overall effectiveness.

That being said, Siekmeier could have strengthened his post-1970 analysis. Out of a two-hundred-page book, a sole chapter (the final one) is devoted to the last thirty years of a sixty-year history. This chapter has the feel of being added on in an attempt to bring the book up to the present. This may be due to the lack of primary source material compared to that available for earlier years. However, there are a number of bilateral events since the 1970s that could have been looked at in more depth. In his introduction, Siekmeier states that the book will analyze U.S.-Bolivian relations from 1952–1971, and it does so very effectively. However, readers may be somewhat disappointed with the post-1970s treatment.

This point aside, Siekmeier's up-to-date interpretation is a welcome and important addition to scholarship.

ROBERT O. KIRKLAND
University of Southern California

ASIA

K. E. BRASHIER. Ancestral Memory in Early China. (Harvard-Yenching Institute Monograph Series, number 72.) Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Asia Center. 2011. Pp. xii, 470. $39.95.

This book builds upon arguments that K. E. Brashier presented in his dissertation and offers several intriguing hypotheses, chief among them Brashier's assertion that early Chinese thinkers advocated something like "performative thinking": i.e., thinking that had an impact on the world outside the agent (p. 229).

Brashier's book adopts a two-pronged approach to the topic of ancestral rites. Parts one, three, and five focus on what members of the governing elite in late the Warring States period and Han dynasty wrote regarding ancestral rites and beliefs about the afterlife. The evenly numbered chapters offer ambitious arguments about social realities in early China. These latter chapters, however thought-provoking, tend to gloss over a host of methodological problems involving extrapolation from texts to classical-era situations.

I warrant that few if any early China specialists can say a great deal more about social realities in early China than Brashier, but he owes readers a fuller explanation about the difficulties involved in describing these conditions. Given the nature of existing documents, historians of the premodern era can only relate what people said and did, but not what they actually believed. Many of the texts that Brashier employs do not reproduce or address the conditions prevailing among "people in general," their prescriptions applying only to high-ranking elites and sometimes only to the ruler. Most importantly, no "religious" sphere was cordoned off from sociopolitical life in China.

Unfortunately, Brashier does not always sufficiently substantiate his assertions. Were Brashier to better ground his hypothesis about "performative thinking" in the received and excavated texts, he would have had to detail the range of physiological operations entailed in "thinking" as described in these texts and consider whether that term captures the complex processes associated with activities of the "heart" (xin). He would also have to ascertain whether any evolution occurred during the long centuries under review in the texts' treatments of display mechanisms and cogitation. Some odd interpretative choices and notable lacunae further limit the force of his analysis. For example, Brashier arranges Buddhist texts alongside the earliest classics and collapses all of the texts into a single anachronistic continuum of early Chinese thought. Brashier moreover rather haphazardly assigns texts to particular schools, in spite of more definitive categorizations (e.g., the Guanzi to "philosophical Daoism," when the authoritative Hanshu 30 characterizes it as "military-strategic") (p. 266).

Some secondary works that Brashier cites seem not fully digested. For example, Brashier's citation of Jane Geaney misses one of her main points: that the absence of a strong reliance on inner-outer contrasts in the notion of the person in early China makes any talk of the "internalization of external moral codes" itself anachronistic. Moreover, the writings of Emile Durkheim and Claude Lévi-Strauss on "religion"—historical constructions reflecting a specific time, place, and ideological stance—cannot stand in for the whole of "Western" thinking on relations binding the living and the dead.

This is a good book and a lively read, but it misses being a great book. Let us celebrate, however, Brashier's substantial achievements. The term "structured amnesia" (p. 65) describing the gradual diminution of sacrifices to the dead over time is remarkably apt. In addition, part three, devoted to the "spectrum of beliefs" in early China, should be required reading for all students of Chinese history. With few exceptions, the translations are accurate. Thus, Brashier's book represents a welcome addition to the libraries of specialists and non-specialists alike.

MICHAEL NYLAN
University of California,
Berkeley

SOPHIE VOLPP. Worldly Stage: Theatricality in Seventeenth-Century China. (Harvard East Asian Monographs, number 267.) Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Asia Center. 2011. Pp. xi, 371. $44.95.

With vigor and nuance, Sophie Volpp explores how sociocultural elites resorted to theatrical spectatorship to contend with the pervasive social and cultural anxieties engendered by the commoditization of Chinese life in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Not only did theater assume a much more prominent place within the cultural practices among the leisured elite, but, more importantly, tropes of theatricality became part and parcel of the cultural critique deployed by champions of the theater and those who vigorously opposed it. In both cases, such rhetoric addressed itself to the growing permeability of social boundaries between the worlds of learning and commerce. In successive chapters, Volpp amplifies her readings of important literary texts—plays, poems, and essays—through the judicious contrast and dialogue with other late Ming and early Qing sources. She successfully reconstructs the social meanings of the multiple rhetorical uses of theatrical tropes in this period. Volpp contends that some segments of the elite developed particular forms of visual discernment in order to differentiate themselves from the vulgar arrivistes. These elites insisted on an aesthetic rooted in simultaneous absorption in and dispassion from the world of forms. In order to delineate that new aesthetic, Volpp inventively discusses figurations of acting, actors, and storytelling in the context of the rise of vernacular literary forms among the sociocultural elite during this period.

Chapter three presents a compelling addition to the body of interpretations of one the period's signature plays, the famed Peony Pavilion (1598) by the erstwhile scholar-official Tang Xianzu (1550–1616). In Volpp's reading, the play, often treated as the locus classicus for the cult of authentic emotion (qing), also represented an intervention in the uses of literary precedent. The school that dominated sixteenth-century politics and literary culture, the so-called Archaists, sought to rejuvenate literary discourse through transformative citation of literary practices current in earlier dynasties. By contrast, another school—clustered around men who championed a sophisticated literary authenticity over the emblematic display of standard learning—began to experiment with new forms, including drama, songs, and fiction. Setting the play against the copious anecdotal literature that made scholastic pedants the butt of jokes, this book demonstrates that Tang's signature play critiques the theatrical artificiality of the followers of Archaism.

Chapter four centers around a lesser-known play by one of the most idiosyncratic figures of the late Ming world of Chinese theater, Wang Jide (ca. 1542–1623). His lone surviving zaju play, entitled The Male Queen, was unusual in that it not only made the cross-dressing of a man as a woman its main topic but exploited the corrosive effects of visual and verbal impersonation on literary authority. The play is not so much concerned with those who might have an unauthentic relation to the past, but, through its attention to the visual and verbal simulation of the actor's gender, asks whether an uncomplicated relation to the historical past is in fact desirable. In an iconoclastic stance, the main protagonist declares himself to be superior to all precedents, thus calling into question the authenticity of originals. In Volpp's interpretation, the play proposes a theatrical aesthetic of indeterminacy that thrives on playing with perspective and perception, positing that, to the trained eye, self-created latter-day simulacra are more valuable than the conventionally revered originals from the past.

Chapter five continues the investigation into the polyvalent figure of the actor in seventeenth-century China in order to explore the empathetic staging of a "homosocial homoerotics." The chapter examines a collection of 150 poems inscribed as colophons by a coterie of eminent statesmen and literary luminaries on an actor by the name of Xu Ziyun. For seventeen years, Xu was romantically involved with Chen Weisong (1625–1682), one of the most famous poets of the early Qing period. Volpp argues that these poems can be understood as part of a quest for distinction through "extraordinary feeling," both in terms of their declarative intensity and their refined male-male focus. In doing so, the book draws attention to empathy as an important facet of the cult of genuine emotion. Accordingly, poetic effusion on the literatus-actor liaison made the authors' feelings both an object of self-dramatization and of sophisticated spectatorship within Chen's circle.

Chapter six explores the changing literati representations of Liu Jingting, a storyteller, both as a historical figure and as a character in the Kong Shangren's (1648–1718) seventeenth-century play Peach Blossom Fan (1699). Volpp argues that Kong recuperated the verbal dexterity of the storyteller, thought by some to be a threat to the literatus, as an exemplary embodiment of the ideological flexibility necessary to reconcile oneself to the transience of dynasties as showcased by the contemporary Ming/Qing transition.

Hence, this work enriches our understanding not only of how the theater—both as a practice and as discourse—gained currency among seventeenth-century Chinese elites, but also of how theater generated a distinctive aesthetic that enjoined the forces of commercialization and the Buddhist rhetoric of detachment to recalibrate what it meant to engage with and to write within the world.

PATRICIA SIEBER
Ohio State University

HO-FUNG HUNG. Protest with Chinese Characteristics: Demonstrations, Riots, and Petitions in the Mid-Qing Dynasty. New York: Columbia University Press. 2011. Pp. xvi, 253. $50.00.

This book is a welcome addition to the small group of English-language studies that attempt to discern patterns in recorded individual or collective breaches of the political and/or legal order in China's two last imperial dynasties. Besides providing numerous vivid vignettes of particular disturbances, Ho-Fung Hung endeavors to relate changing patterns of protest both to larger socioeconomic and political trends (growth of the market economy and "state centralization") and to Chinese "cultural schemas." He also proposes revisions to allegedly Euronormative assumptions about changing patterns of protest.

Hung's argument runs as follows. The most readily available set of records suggests that mid-Qing "protests" happened in three discontinuous "waves": ca. 1740–1759, 1776–1795, and 1820–1839. In the first wave, "state-engaging" protests, mostly in quest of famine relief, predominated over "state-resisting" protests, the majority of which involved either expressions of resentment against the government (or individual officials) or objections to state interference with "illicit activities." In this phase, protesters often manifested a "filial-loyal" disposition, representing themselves as supplicants to the grace of an establishment that ruled on behalf of Heaven and maintained the will and the capacity to relieve popular hunger. In the second wave, "state-engaging protests" occupied a mere 17.1 percent of the recorded "protests," with "state-resisting protests" an overwhelming majority. The largest category of protests in this wave comprised those occasioned by government efforts to quell "illicit activities." Protests were more likely to be violent and may, in some regions, have been related to the subsequent outbreak of major rebellions, such as the White Lotus Rebellion (1796–1805). The growth in anti-state violence reflects decline in the perceived legitimacy of the imperial institution, tarnished by widespread rumors about the sexual adventures of the ageing Qianlong emperor. By the third wave, despite setbacks to the market economy and weakened central-government effectiveness, "reformist rhetoric" (p. 137) under Qianlong's son and grandson had restored popular trust in the monarchy. "State-resisting" protests now occupied a reduced majority (74.7 percent). Most of the protests still involved violence; "resisting crackdown against illicit activities" remained the largest subcategory. However, grass-roots folk trusted the emperor enough to have their representatives risk heavy punishment by seeking to appeal to the throne. This became something of a vogue in the third wave.

Such, for Hung, was the distinctively Chinese "early modern" "trajectory" of "protest transformation." If European protest was moving in linear fashion "from state-resisting to state-engaging" with the aid of the "emergent cultural schema of popular sovereignty" (pp. 173, 176), Chinese protest had made the transition, with the first wave, "from state-resisting [dominant in the period 1645–1739] to state-engaging," only to loop back to "state-resisting," while the mentality of "filial loyalty" made a comeback. It follows that the European trajectory "can no longer be seen as a universal and natural path applicable everywhere" (p. 173). Hung seeks to position his three-phase cycle as developmentally antecedent to China's post-Opium-War "reactive violence against the state"; he adduces this perceived continuity to support the view that Chinese modernity antedates the Opium War, having "started to crystallize in the eighteenth century" (pp. 173–174).

Although Hung does well in adducing sources missed by other authors (myself included) in his account of a 1748 demonstration in Suzhou, there may be issues of interpretation here and elsewhere in his book. Unfortunately, his practice of limiting his documentation to a list of sources at the commencement of each vignette makes it difficult to check any given statement for fidelity; I regret any resulting injustice in what follows. I have been unable to verify that an "anonymous pamphlet" circulated by "elites" (Hung's word, I stress) "reported that twenty-one grain merchants who refused to lower their prices were beaten to death by government runners" (p. 89). The provincial governor, at least, responding to the emperor's inquiry about an allegation that twenty-one "people" had suffered such deaths, appears to have interpreted the allegation as referring to his treatment of the rioters. He had, he claimed, had only the three ringleaders executed in this way, in accordance with the emperor's instructions, and had shown varying degrees of leniency to the rest (see Shiliao xunkan [1930–1931], vol. 29, section "di," pp. 54a–b; cf. ibid., p. 57b). Does the historian's craft really lie in "get[ting] to the truth" like "a detective" and then serving the reader with a "reasonably accurate narrative" (p. 57) cleansed of all traces of engagement with the problematic sources? This reviewer feels on surer ground when the realities of "source" production are acknowledged, and when reasons for apparently bold inferences are shared with the reader.

There is much to admire in this book. The profiles of protest are interesting and lively, in a general way Eurocentrism is indeed to be opposed, and there is plausibility in the linkage of evolving patterns of protest with changes in the larger economic and political environment. The author's ambition to discern a meaningful pattern in the large, heterogeneous corpus of protest records is also praiseworthy and has produced results that merit respectful consideration in our future studies of Qing history.

HELEN DUNSTAN
University of Sydney

ETHAN ISAAC SEGAL. Coins, Trade, and the State: Economic Growth in Early Medieval Japan. (Harvard East Asian Monographs, number 334.) Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Asia Center. 2011. Pp. xii, 258. $39.95.

This book revisits the topic of decentralization in Japan between the seventh and the sixteenth centuries. Ethan Isaac Segal agrees with the prevailing scholarly assessment of the period and sees Japan as gradually devolving from a centralized (proto) nation-state into some three hundred independent domains and then fairly quickly reuniting in a confederation of vassal domains under a single master. Segal contributes to this discussion by highlighting the role of money in the decline of the power of the state and the rise of local trade, markets, and agency.

The reason for the fragmentation was the wholesale transfer of land to temples and shrines, relatives, and clients to the extent that half the potential tax base was in untaxed estates by 1200. As control, if not outright ownership, of land fell into the hands of estate managers and peasants, the capital lost its status as the major center of economic activity and province-level activity became more important, as indicated by the proliferation of Pure Land and Zen family chapels. The surplus created by new strains of rice and technologies gave the advantage to the peasants since taxes and rent were calculated in set units that were not revised to reflect the rise in productivity. The period of the latter middle ages through the sixteenth century can be seen as a competition between the farming and the military classes. And, as we know by the eventual commutation of goods, rice, and labor taxes to forty percent (in principle) of rice and the right of villages to self-government, the peasants won.

Segal identifies money as a major player in this larger pattern of fragmentation. While the imperial government claimed the exclusive right to mint coins, it could never mint enough, prevent counterfeiting, or control the coins' market value. Copper coins were brought from China, through formal and informal channels. Segal sees the massive shift in the economy in the late thirteenth century as caused by the constellation of improvements in weather, rice strains and agricultural technology, and shipbuilding in Japan. These factors complemented an influx of coins from China, which was minting massive amounts of copper coin in the Northern Song period (960–1127), a time of enormous increase in Chinese urbanization, industrial output, and population. The Japanese wanted coins, first and foremost, because they were easy to store and did not spoil and, secondly, because they were cheaper to transport, sometimes by as much as forty percent, than commodities heretofore demanded as rent or taxes. Even coins were expensive to transport, and, in response, bills of exchange or paper certificates emerged in long-distance and even local trade; costs were cut to fifteen percent. Segal places the onus of guaranteeing the certificates on the merchant looking for return business since the government did not, as it did in China, offer such guarantees. His analysis provokes questions about the role that estate managers, who frequently exerted their clout as they supervised local markets, villages, and temples and shrines, played in the process of guaranteeing these transactions.

Segal has established his credentials with this work. But, there are several things about the monograph that indicate questionable changes in the culture of academe. The book is well written, except for the ubiquitous split infinitive, which, of course, would bother only someone of my age and stodginess. But there are contradictory "codes" in the volume. The narrative's three-part structure (first, tell what you are going to discuss; two, discuss; three, summarize the discussion) and the large typeface make the book seem bigger than it should be. At the same time, the truncated footnotes, even in first citations, indicate that a smaller volume was desired (ostensibly, by the publisher). If, indeed, a larger volume were desired, the footnotes could be considerably expanded. Certainly, the volume could support a larger index: "shroffing," which appears several times in the text, is not included. And, finally, Segal makes clear that the only western-language sources consulted were English, despite the increase in online access to foreign dissertations. This confirms a sense of insularity—even provinciality—at work in the United States. This is a bit unsettling, considering the increasing numbers of Americans descending on the triennial meeting of the European Association of Japanese Studies.

All things considered, I recommend this book, especially as a text for undergraduate courses. Segal refines our understanding of the importance of money and financial transactions during a critical period in Japanese history.

SYBIL ANNE THORNTON
Arizona State University

KÄREN WIGEN. A Malleable Map: Geographies of Restoration in Central Japan, 1600–1912. (Asia: Local Studies/Global Themes, number 17.) Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 2010. Pp. xvii, 319. $39.95.

If a key theme in the recent literature on Japan's pre-modern cartographic traditions has been the relationship between maps and the idea of nation, then the first thing to set Kären Wigen's new work apart is its focus on a single region. What does it mean, Wigen asks, that the modern prefecture (ken) of Nagano, a late nineteenth-century creation, occupies the same physical space as that of the ancient province (kuni) of Shinano, first laid out under the eighth-century Ritsuryō state. In terms of topography, Nagano is hardly a "natural" unit, and politically, the struggles of the sixteenth century left the area divided into a hodgepodge of administrative districts. How then did ancient Shinano re-emerge in the guise of modern Nagano?

Part of the answer is, of course, to be found in the spread, during the late Tokugawa period, of Nativist-inspired yearnings for a return to the "golden age" of imperial rule, before the rise of the warrior clans from around the twelfth century. Wigen discusses the importance of the idea of "Restoration" at various points throughout the text and reflects thoughtfully on the uses of the ancient in Meiji political culture. She also provides a fascinating overview of the local political struggles to which the 1876 decision to redraw the prefectural boundaries to match those of ancient Shinano gave rise (as late as 1948 residents of the southwestern part of the prefecture were still trying to have the decision reversed).

Wigen's main focus, however, is ultimately not the intellectual or political history of the mid-nineteenth century so much as the development, over a much longer span of time, of a series of six different methods for depicting and describing the region, each of which is the subject of a single chapter. Wigen begins with an analysis of the premodern tradition of "national maps" (Ni- hon sōzu), which depicted the provinces as part of a larger geospatial system, and uses this to show how changing political and economic conditions led to shifts in the way Shinano's place in the archipelago was imagined over time. The second chapter examines the Tokugawa regime's practice of commissioning special maps (kuniezu) based on the boundaries of the ancient provinces in order to gain a comprehensive overview of basic conditions across an otherwise fragmented country. It offers close readings of the four surviving Shinano kuniezu and concludes by describing how versions of these maps had begun to circulate commercially in the nineteenth century, presumably thereby impacting popular consciousness. The third chapter takes up the development of modern mapping and considers how the old geographical unit of Shinano was eventually recast as Nagano using the new scientific techniques. The impression that one gets from these three chapters is that while the provincial map may have been malleable, it also had profound staying power. Wigen specifically takes up the question of continuity at the end of chapter three, engaging Thongchai Winichakul's influential Siam Mapped: A History of the Geo-Body of a Nation (1994) to suggest that the shift to a modern mode of spatial representation in Japan was not nearly as abrupt or disruptive as it seems to have been in Thailand. To my mind, this insight could have been developed further in the fourth and fifth chapters, which take up the role of statistical compilations and geography texts in the modern construction of regions.

Rather than examine how Tokugawa practices of political arithmetic or local place writing may have prefigured what followed, Wigen instead portrays the modern statistical yearbook and geography primer as heirs to the classical (eighth-century) gazetteer (fudoki) tradition. This allows her to remain squarely focused on the ancient province (the standard referential frame for the gazetteers) and to reconnect her narrative to the theme of Restoration, but only at the cost of eliding some of the complexity that makes the Tokugawa-Meiji transition so useful for thinking about the onset of modernity generally. If the fourth and fifth chapters struck me as a missed opportunity in this regard, Wigen's final chapter, about the relationship of newspapers to regionalism in modern Nagano, offers a compelling portrayal of the dynamism of local society and the power of print capital during the Meiji period.

Overall, there is no question that this is a deeply original, thought-provoking book that will be read with great profit by anyone interested in Japan, or in developing a comparative perspective on practices of regional place making in the modern world. And, yes, as the back cover promises, the maps are indeed gorgeous.

DANIEL BOTSMAN
Yale University

DAQING YANG. Technology of Empire: Telecommunications and Japanese Expansion in Asia, 1883–1945. (Harvard East Asian Monographs, number 219.) Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Asia Center. 2010. Pp. xvii, 446. $49.95.

Scholars have long awaited the arrival of Daqing Yang's book, which does not disappoint in terms of breadth. Yang engages a variety of topics ranging from Meiji-era Japanese companies that engaged in laying cables between Japan and its colonies on the Chinese mainland, to the men that staffed the Ministry of Communications, to the technological issues bureaucrats hashed out in their journals, to internal policy debates. Yang even manages to weave in key discussions of the Imperial Diet and the story of how vast telecommunications projects were financed.

The tome is divided into four major sections covering the period from 1853 to 1945. Yang actually presents two stories simultaneously: the Meiji tale of the rise and expansion of Japanese telecommunications services (gloriously detailed in parts one and two), and a second narrative about telecommunications networks and how they were controlled during the 1930s and 1940s (developed in parts three and four). The second story ties more clearly into the larger thrust of the book regarding the cozy relationship between technology and empire and may deserve independent monographic treatment.

Yang notes the "material means of either building Japan's empire or holding it together are still largely taken for granted rather than being thoroughly investigated" (p. 5). His research examines the role and technology of telecommunications (telegram, radio, and phone) in Japanese overseas expansion: what he labels "techno-imperialism." As Yang underscores, techno-imperialism traces its genesis to at least the Meiji era and was not driven by the pursuit of technology alone but also constituted a system of institutions and individuals. For example, a Japanese official in 1937 Singapore was surprised that letters from Great Britain or the United States took mere days to arrive whereas letters from Japan took closer to a month. The transport systems were different; the former used airmail while Japan employed seaborne mail. The Japanese not only required advanced technology to power their empire, which they had, but also a coordinated communications policy "to fully realize its space-adjusting potential" (p. 279). The irony is that, as successful as Japan was in establishing a techno-empire, it was unable to maintain one. The infrastructure broke down due to the very manner in which Japanese rulers created and serviced the nuts and bolts of their imperial domain.

Yang delves into meticulous detail analyzing the official circles through which the Ministry of Communications entered China, Manchuria, and Southeast Asia. He also notes which modes of control officials exercised to keep these various telecommunication technologies tied into Japan. It was not just a question of control but also of addressing the constant conflict among several types of agencies—military, colonial, and civilian—that competed for control over communications networks. The foibles and fantasies of these networks stand as an allegory to the empire in general because Japan's Greater East Asia Coprosperity Sphere was informal and lacked an institutional blueprint. Yang reminds us that “plans for the imperial telecommunications network in East Asia speak volumes about the nature of Japan’s new expansion in Asia” (p. 205).

Yang’s book opens and closes by highlighting the moment of Emperor Hirohito’s speech on August 15, 1945, when the Japanese monarch was essentially able to broadcast his voice into all corners of the empire due to the telecommunications networks that Japan had been developing since the early Meiji era. It is a fitting way to bookend the story because it demonstrates at once both the majesty of what the Japanese were able to achieve and also the scale of the system’s fragility.

Yang offers us a chance to gaze at the internal workings of empire and to admire myriad of wires, transistors, transformers, and other electronic filaments that made the whole apparatus hum. At times the tangle of the system can be a bit daunting but ultimately, by slowly and carefully tracing our route, the story reveals how empire truly operated.

BARAK KUSHNER
University of Cambridge

MITHI MUKHERJEE. India in the Shadows of Empire: A Legal and Political History 1774–1950. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. xxxviii, 278. $50.00.

In this book, Mithi Mukherjee boldly argues that Indian nationalism experienced a paradigmatic change in the twentieth century as Indians sought to redefine the concept of liberty. However, by highlighting the transient nature of this change, Mukherjee seeks to reveal the underlying pattern that structures chaotic multi-party politics in postcolonial India and reveal its imperial, specifically juristic, roots.

The shift at the center of Mukherjee’s narrative occurred through the efforts of individuals like Mohandas K. Gandhi who successfully articulated a particularly Indic notion of liberty. Based on the renunciative concept of mukti, this new notion challenged the desirability of a society governed by a legalistic understanding of the imperial state as the arbiter of particularistic communal demands. Mukherjee identifies this shift as the precondition for Indians to escape the British imperial system by permitting the conceptualization of a radical notion of liberty that did not require the imperial state. However, Mukherjee avers that this transcendence of imperial concepts proved to be temporary. After independence, Indian politicians returned to making special interest claims. In the process, these politicians implicitly reinforced the notion that the primary role of the central government is to arbitrate these claims in the style of the previous imperial government.

Just as Lawrence Rosen proposed that law reflects as well constitutes a wider universe of meanings (see Rosen, Law and Culture: An Invitation [2006]), Mukherjee points to the existence of patterns spanning the domains of law and politics in India. This recognition is an important contribution because it unites the fields of legal and political history much more closely than previous writing on legal issues in India has done. Other authors (for one example, see Lata Mani, Contentious Traditions: The Debate on Sati in Colonial India [1998]) have written about the philosophical and social implications of the manner in which the supposed contradiction between cultural autonomy and women’s rights was discussed in British India, and on the centrality of law in the writings of British philosophers reflecting on empire (see, for example, Robert Travers, Ideology and Empire in Eighteenth Century India: The British in Bengal [2006]). Mukherjee’s book is unique because she suggests that law provided not only occasions for political organization and debate but the very model for politics in colonial as well as postcolonial India.

Mukherjee’s legalistic emphasis also points to the book’s greatest weakness. Was colonial law really the sole source of Indian liberalism and the liberal nationalism that it inspired? Christopher A. Bayly’s Recovering Liberties: Indian Thought in the Age of Liberalism and Empire (2012) points to several other sources of Indian liberal thought, such as religious speculation. Whether or not one agrees with Bayly regarding the liberating potential of liberalism, he certainly casts the net wider. By specifically looking at a limited number of cautious politicians, and somewhat arbitrarily excluding the more radical ones—the “Extremists”—from the story, Mukherjee may have made her task harder. One wonders whether liberal nationalism in India appears truncated with an excessive focus on arbitrariness rather than on political representation or social contract as a result of Mukherjee’s narrow definition.

A broader notion of nationalism would have allowed Mukherjee to take account of the political ideologies expressed during the rebellion of 1857, the demand for systematic consultation of “Hindustanis” made by Syed Ahmed Khan after that event, the many peasant and tribal rebellions which Ranajit Guha said denounced the trio of zamindar-sahukar-sarkar (landlord-money-lender-state), and the pan-Islamic movement of the late 1910s. The multiplicity of political ideologies undermines the claim that mukti was the only genealogical predecessor of radical nationalist claims to full sovereignty. Mukherjee fails to explain how other concepts, such as azadi, entered the political vocabulary of influential figures like Subhas Chandra Bose.

Mukherjee implicitly suggests that xenophobic territorial nationalism is a more natural political attitude than extra-territorial royalism. But loyalist pleas for royal justice need not necessarily have precluded more radical concepts of government based on popular consent—as students of the American War of Independence know very well. In order to understand the “loyalism” of dalit (lower-caste) leaders such as Babasaheb Ramji Ambedkar, we should pay greater attention to their concerns about the cooperativist view of society that Gandhi espoused. Ambedkar remained unconvinced when Gandhi denied the need for dalit political representation and emphasized the importance and efficacy of self-reform and self-restraint by caste Hindus instead.

In sum, this is an important book, and it makes an important argument. Its strength lies in its conceptual clarity and innovativeness. This book will spark much fruitful discussion for South Asianists, those interested in legal and political analysis of British imperialism, and scholars interested in non-European liberalism.

NANDINI CHATTERJEE
University of Plymouth

PARNA SENGUPTA. Pedagogy for Religion: Missionary Education and the Fashioning of Hindus and Muslims in Bengal. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 2011. Pp. x, 211. Cloth $65.00, paper $18.95.

Does education form the adult person? Does modern liberal Western education produce secularism in the non-West? If the answer to the former is "yes," as it was for both the colonizer and the colonized in nineteenth-century India, then it follows that the answer to the latter becomes complicated, because nationalist pedagogues of different religious and regional backgrounds could seek to inculcate their own preferred combinations of modern and religious identities. Parna Sengupta's book is about how Christian missionary education provided a model of religious education and how Indian educators turned this model to further their own notions of communal identity.

Beginning in the mid-eighteenth century in Britain as Methodism, the religious impetus reached the colony of India in the late eighteenth century as a desire to awaken and reform the Hindu masses. Missionaries in India, argues Sengupta, could be more innovative in their pedagogic techniques than back home because they had fewer controls on them and their mission was more challenging in a land of heathenism. The state, meanwhile, was torn between its colonial agenda and a notion of charity—and mass education, predictably, failed to take off. Modern education, from the beginning, came to be primarily "private" in India: missionary, vernacular, or "Anglo-vernacular."

The technology of modern schooling revolves around the textbook. Sengupta discusses the conflict surrounding textbook selection between John Murdoch, the founder of the Christian Vernacular Education Society, and Iswar Chandra Vidyasagar, author and publisher. Although primarily a Sanskrit scholar, Vidyasagar composed the Bengali primer Barnoparichay (1855). Murdoch insisted that textbooks carry a larger portion of evangelical material but the non-religious primers of Vidyasagar were more popular, even among missionary educators. In order to resolve this conflict, missionaries introduced "religion" as a separate subject in otherwise non-religious primary schools.

Modern pedagogy also involved using "object" lessons, a technique first introduced by the Swiss educator, Johann Heinrich Pestalozzi. The primacy of sensory learning, to be followed by abstract ideas, was converted in its British, and then colonial, setting to explicitly moral and ideological lessons. Sengupta briefly describes this process, and then makes the argument that this Christian paradigm of the seemingly scientific approach was converted by bhadralok (gentlemen) reformers in Bengal to an upper-caste, Hindu paradigm. As British textbooks distanced themselves from the "other" of the colored heathen in the colony, the new Indian textbooks made the tribal or adivasi a metaphor for the "others" who were lower down in the social and religious scale.

The native teachers had to be civilized separately according to gender, and, apart from being made familiar with a dozen subjects, they were to learn appropriate behavior that approximated that of good (Christian) fathers and mothers. This ambitious task was made impossible by the rival claims of racial and ethnic hierarchies. Respectability, according to both the British and upper-caste Hindus, ultimately could not be taught but was "an inherent quality based on gender, caste and race" (p. 121). Yet, until the twentieth century, upper-caste women did not seek teachers' training and upper-caste girls were left without teachers.

Finally, we come to an argument about the differential construction of Hindu and Muslim subjects. The Bengali Muslim was constructed as "backward" twice over, once as poor and indifferent to modernization in the colonial mold, and second as practitioner of ignorant, non-Islamic practices. The result was that, since the colonial state preferred education to be private, and upper-caste Hindus had already taken up the mantle, ashraf (elite) Muslims did the same for poor Muslims and added religious teaching as an essential tool for the removal of backwardness. Muslim educators thus merely followed the model of Christian missionary schools in learning to educate and uplift simultaneously. The central role played by education—although the author rejects teleology—in the construction of separate political identities is clear. Had the Christian example of religion in education been different, the production of Hindu and Muslim identities in Bengal and India would have been less differentiated.

Unfortunately, the two chapters on textbooks and object lessons leave one eager for more discussion, as do the two on schoolteachers. The study of education in India needs more historical and ethnographic descriptions of teachers, classrooms, lessons, and textbooks. Sengupta has rich data and clear hypotheses; it is not entirely obvious why she cuts her discussions short (apart from being a succinct author) and also why she leaves her chapters unconnected to each other, like several essays conceptualized separately. This sense is heightened by the device of an introduction and a conclusion to sum up each chapter's arguments, with no reference to any preceding or following arguments. Still, this is excellent research, if a little bumpily presented. I am sure that in future books Sengupta will construct a more seamless narrative.

NITA KUMAR
Claremont McKenna College

HOWARD SPODEK. Ahmedabad: Shock City of Twentieth-Century India. Bloomington: Indiana University Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 330. Cloth $49.95, e-book $41.95.

Howard Spodek's book is a lucidly written biography of India's fifth largest city, today with an estimated population of 4.7 million people. This excellent study is the culmination of a half-century of research on a city in which Spodek first lived in 1964 and to which he continues to return. Spodek's lovingly told yet critical assessment of Ahmedabad reflects his deep affection for the place and many of its prominent twentieth-century residents. Using Asa Briggs's model of Manchester as the "shock city" of Victorian England, Spodek both elevates Ahmedabad above its status as one of India's "second cities" and enriches Briggs's original analytical framework in a new context and period. While demonstrating that Ahmedabad has led urban trends in India, Spodek furthermore focuses our attention upon the contradictions, conflicts, and transitions with which we associate twentieth-century megacities worldwide.

This is a book that focuses squarely and intentionally on Ahmedabad's leadership, as well as on the public and private institutions that have shaped the city's highs and lows. For those interested in the more gritty and popular aspects of the city's history, Spodek's study can be read productively alongside Achyut Yagnik and Suchitra Sheth's Ahmedabad: From Royal City to Megacity (2011).

The book is chronologically organized into three substantial parts. The first and longest section, which focuses on the period from 1900 to 1950, is defined by the new politics brought by Mohandas K. Gandhi. Much of this section will not be entirely new to a reader familiar with Gandhi's life in Ahmedabad, the rise of Vallabhbhai Patel as a civic leader, and the work of the Majoor Mahajan (or Textile Workers' Association), founded by Ansuyaben Sarabhai. What is of great use for the uninitiated is Spodek's perspective on how the city's traditional civic elites gave way to a new generation of leaders in the early twentieth century, making the interests of the city's industrial workforce a defining feature of Ahmedabad's political fault lines in the period of nationalist struggle.

The second part, on the "Westernizing City—1950–1970," juxtaposes two kinds of leadership that dominated Ahmedabad's life in the three decades following independence. Spodek draws attention to the city's industrialist leaders, Ambalal Sarabhai and Kasturbhai Lalbhai, who promoted prosperity through sacrifice on the part of labor and benevolent philanthropy on the part of industrial elites. Alongside these luminaries, Spodek examines leaders who sought to jettison both the authority of the city's mahajans (or guilds) and the Gandhian industrial relations that had succeeded them.

Spodek's treatment of the charismatic leader, Indulal Yagnik, a Gandhian turned peasant organizer who took up regional and class politics in the 1950s, deserves special mention. Yagnik possessed both the oratory skill and the will to confront power that drew the population, whether middle or working class, into city politics. Tracing Yagnik's life in politics, Spodek demonstrates how nationalist alliances gave way to associations based upon language, caste, region, and religious communities between 1950 and 1970.

The final section, "Creativity and Chaos," is devoted to the transformations that have characterized Ahmedabad since the late 1960s. Here we learn about not only how party disputes compromised the city's institutions beyond repair, but also how communal violence became a norm of city life. As the crisis of the mill industry reached its conclusion in the early 1980s, the industrial institutions of the city failed to serve the stabilizing role that they had previously performed. Spodek highlights the emergence of a new ethos in the city forged by a subsequent generation of business leaders who purposefully steered clear of civic engagement. The result was a new civic attitude in Ahmedabad typified by the Gujarati phrase "Maaray shun?" or "What is it to me?" The purposeful disengagement of a new generation of Gujarati entrepreneurs was mirrored by public disillusionment and apathy, providing the context for the intertwining of crime syndicates and communal politics. Spodek demonstrates that the political and civic fragmentation of Ahmedabad's population prefigures disturbing trends that have been seen in other emerging megacities in India.

Whereas Manchester served as a model for the political and civic transformations that characterized the Victorian era, it may very well be that its twentieth-century counterpart is to be found not in the de-industrializing cities of Europe or North America, but instead in Spodek's dynamic Ahmedabad.

LISA TRIVEDI
Hamilton College

OCEANIA AND THE PACIFIC ISLANDS

CHRISTINE WRIGHT. Wellington's Men in Australia: Peninsular War Veterans and the Making of Empire c. 1820–40. (War, Culture and Society, 1750–1850.) New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. vii, 243. £55.00.

The history of settler colonialism is an increasingly lively field, now boasting a journal, Settler Colonial Studies, and provocative schema such as James Belich's contention of an Anglo settler revolution in the early nineteenth century connected to technological and economic change. Christine Wright's welcome addition to the field also contributes to histories of Australia and the British Empire, and may perhaps best be situated in what Australian historian Peter Stanley terms "military social history."

Wright's book, based on her Ph.D. thesis, is an impressively researched prosopographical study of the British army veterans of the Peninsular War who settled in the Australian colonies in the 1820s and 1830s, when there was a rapid expansion of free settlers alongside the continuing system of convict transportation. The Peninsular War, fought in Portugal and Spain from 1808 to 1814, was the latter stages of Britain and its allies' war against Napoleon. The British army had expanded sixfold during the generation-long struggle against revolutionary France, then Napoleon. At war's end there was massive demobilization, with the army reduced from 236,000 soldiers in 1814 to 81,000 in 1819; the navy's reductions were additional to these. Wright demonstrates that large numbers of young men who would not previously have been able to afford to purchase army commissions and promotions were able to raise their social status during the war—that is, if they survived it. Many of the officers who were put on half-pay retainers in the postwar years found that they and their families could not survive on half-pay in Britain's collapsed postwar economy; migration to the settler colonies became an attractive option.

These demobilized officers were drawn to New South Wales, partly because of its climate, partly because of the availability of cheap convict labor, and partly because of the generous system of land grants to military officers introduced in 1826. While this system (which obtained in Canada and the Cape Colony as well) was curtailed in 1831, army officers continued to receive special discounts on land correlated to their length of service. In the Australian colonies, the timing of the veterans' desire to emigrate was particularly significant. Frontier areas were being opened to settlers, and veterans could augment their grants to acquire large estates.

Peninsular War veterans in Australia established family dynasties, obtained magistracies, and garnered power and influence through their connections to army veterans in high places, such as New South Wales governors Ralph Darling and his successor Richard Bourke. These social networks provided incentives for migration and, in the colonies, helped to shape settlement locations (often near other veterans), marital patterns, and business connections.

Wright not only establishes the significant scale of the migration of Peninsular War veterans but also outlines their influence and impact in the Australian colonies, particularly through evangelical Protestantism and Masonic lodges. Veterans brought with them skills, learned during war, that were of great value in the colonial context: topographical surveying, sketching, drafting, town-planning, map-making, road-building, engineering, and medicine. Moreover, they augmented the intellectual elite with their interests in literature and art.

Part of the significance of Wright's study for Australian history is that she articulates the ways in which this substantial influx of army officers contributed to the militarist nature of mid-century Australian colonial society. Beginning with the British invasion in 1788, officers and the army largely ran the penal colonies. Peninsular War veterans dominated civil offices, from governor to magistrate to Crown Lands Commissioner. Army officers also constituted the majority of garrison officers, Mounted Police, and penal commandants; thus they represented a close overlapping of civil and military authority and power, extending and entrenching the colonies' military culture.

This is a fine, engagingly written, and erudite study. Some scholars will see links to Zoe Laidlaw's Colonial Connections 1815–1845: Patronage, the Information Revolution and Colonial Government (2005), which examines networks across the mid-nineteenth-century British Empire. Wright's work differs in its focus on the Australian colonies, and its detailed and nuanced exploration of the veterans' impact on this one part of the empire. Wright shows us, in a clear and persuasive fashion, the scale of the migration of Peninsular War veterans to the Australian colonies, the significance of the army's half-pay system in making veterans eager and desirable colonial appointments, the veterans' ascension to colonial gentry status, and their shaping of colonial society in particular conservative, authoritarian, and militarist directions.

ANGELA WOOLLACOTT
Australian National University

CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

KAREN A. BALCOM. The Traffic in Babies: Cross-Border Adoption and Baby-Selling between the United States and Canada, 1930–1972. (Studies in Gender and History, number 38.) Buffalo, N.Y.: University of Toronto Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 356. $35.00.

Karen A. Balcom's new book is a groundbreaking historical study of the movement of children across borders. While studies of adoption, both domestic and international, have proliferated in recent decades, none goes as far as this one in documenting the process, the involvement of individuals, and the complicated contexts of immigration and family law, state and provincial autonomy, and federal agendas regarding transnational cooperation from the 1930s to the present.

Each of the six chapters begins with a Canadian example to initiate an analysis of the relationships across a border usually ignored in the literature on child circulation. Chapter one describes key female Canadian reformers of the 1930s and the networks they formed with counterparts in the United States. Chapters two, three, and four cover the years from 1945 to 1960; each uses an incident of exploitation, corruption, and violation of "best practices" to frame the story of embattled experts, defensive state and provincial officials, and federal agencies reluctant to challenge state/provincial rights on domestic matters. The last chapter discusses the persistent clash of baby markets, best practices, and legal oversight throughout 1954–1964. The conclusion suggests a direction for future studies of cross-border child transfers, potentially transcending the Euro-American concept of adoption.

The actors in Balcom's story include strong-willed women whose arguments for reform confronted the patriarchal ideologies of government officials; these officials stymied efforts to “professionalize” child placement. Balcom extends this familiar story by comparing the histories of federal control over immigration and the criteria for citizenship in the United States and Canada. She shows that arguments by professionals for reform in both nations confronted the daunting obstacle of cultural and administrative restrictions on interpretations of identity and of kinship. These restrictions embodied nationalistic ideologies that blocked consensus on best placement across local, regional, and national borders. The ideologies to which she refers intertwined with perceptions of race and religion in the practices and policies that evolved in each country.

Balcom historicizes the role of race and religion in child placement, and examines the breakdown in consensus accompanying an imbalance of supply and demand. Chapter four, for example, explores the post-World War II transfer of Catholic children from Quebec to Jewish adoptive parents in the northeastern United States against the wishes of birth parents and the advice of professional social workers. In this and other chapters, Balcom points out that diverse parties circumvented standard best practices, challenging the significance of racial and religious matching: venal baby brokers found odd bedfellows in liberal advocates of nurture over nature, of race-blind placement, and of “rescue” as the justification for unrestricted placements. Furthermore, she portrays the external contexts that affected both illegal and legal child transfers, such as the U.S. civil rights movement and the claim of racial genocide, the Native American protest against removal of children, and the First Nations complaints in Canada about the placement of indigenous children in white families.

Balcom relates the controversies over racial, religious, and ethnic matching to the evolution of immigration laws in Canada and the United States. Her discussion of consuls and customs officers, passport regulations and documentation of status places adoption in the arena of border control institutions that reflect global politics. One knotty concern becomes clear: a child transferred illegally or semi-legally might lose all privileges of citizenship, subject to deportation regardless of her kinship ties. Although the bulk of Balcom’s data involves children moving from Canada to the United States, she mentions the opposite flow, which intensified in the late twentieth century when U.S. child placement experts deemed Canada desirable as a “racially tolerant” society.

The ostensible subject of this book is adoption (and its evil twin, baby selling), but that is misleading. Balcom uses child transfer to illuminate the problems of cross-border crossing of any sort. Individual parents (birth and adoptive), as well as individual children, do not dominate her history. Rather, she writes a history of enmeshment, in which every actor is a figure in a larger battle over individual and collective rights, over national policy versus transnational coordination, and over the definition of “best interests” in a world of negotiable racial, ethnic, and religious identities.

In her almost month-by-month account, Balcom offers the reader a remarkably detailed history. She draws on a vast array of sources, from the personal letters of individuals who spearheaded reform to archival records of federal, state, provincial, and local agencies. If there is a fault in the book, it lies in the historian’s temptation to display data and to interrupt a powerful narrative with digressive references to missteps, misunderstandings, failed policies, and unenforced laws.

This book should appeal to a wide audience, including experts who continue to face the difficulties Balcom outlines, immigration officials who oversee the movement of children, individuals whose lives cross borders, and scholars who can find in the book a model of historical research, imaginative interpretive tools, and commitment to a topic whose importance will grow in the coming decades.

JUDITH MODELL SCHACHTER
Carnegie Mellon University

VERONICA STRONG-BOAG. Fostering Nation? Canada Confronts Its History of Childhood Disadvantage. (Studies in Childhood and Family in Canada.) Waterloo, Ontario: Wilfrid Laurier University Press. 2011. Pp. x, 302. $85.00.

Veronica Strong-Boag’s book provides an insightful and sobering account of the development of alternative care for needy children in Canada. She painstakingly explores “the missteps and the detours of a century and more of child protection efforts by Canadians and their governments as they confronted the specter of children judged neglected, abused, deficient, and delinquent” (p. 3). Although she is careful not to generalize and to acknowledge that some disadvantaged children have prospered against the odds, the picture that emerges in this book is disturbing. Canadians have not fostered a nation committed to equality of opportunity for children and youth. Ultimately, Strong-Boag argues that such a nation is not possible unless and until Canadians embrace justice for adults: for poor and overwhelmed birth parents, foster and surrogate households, and overtaxed social workers.

Strong-Boag tells her story in seven chapters. First, she explores “the role of family and kin in the safeguarding of offspring” (p. 6) and the inequality of material resources that has undermined the attempts of many families to provide for children. Next, she examines the institutions for children that remain a significant component of Canada’s child welfare system. Her third chapter documents the rise of fostering as an alternative both to institutional care and to adoption from the late nineteenth century to the 1960s. The fourth chapter focuses on the period from the 1960s onward, with particular attention to the fate of Aboriginal children, removed from their birth families in unprecedented numbers in this decade. Her next chapter examines the experiences of adults who surrendered their children, illustrating “how poverty has always made some adults susceptible to difficulties as parents and the loss of progeny” (p. 115). She pays careful attention to the ways in which discourses of blame have been particularly harsh with regard to unwed and single mothers, racialized mothers, the criminalized, and the disabled. The sixth chapter examines the discursive construction of fostering and the experiences of fostering parents, in particular the mothers who “as surrogates and amateurs have always struggled to be treated as more than inferior mimics of ‘real’ parents or ‘real’ experts” (p. 143). Finally, she turns her attention to children themselves and asserts that “it is hard to escape the sense of a recurring nightmare endured by many Canadian youngsters” (p. 173).

This book should be required reading, not only for historians of childhood, the family, and social policy but for the public in general. It documents in disturbing detail the structural inequalities and prejudices that have condemned too many children to live in poverty, with stunted opportunities for education and employment and without the love, care, and affection that all children deserve. While there are certainly inspiring stories of success told in the pages of this text, the “result of the courage and generosity of ordinary citizens” (p. 2) who opened their homes and hearts to needy children who were not their biological kin, Strong-Boag’s “sadness and anger” (p. 1) are palpable and overwhelmingly justified. Too many of us are indifferent to the fate of children society deemed (and deems) beyond rescue, and discourses of individual blame are increasingly applied, in a neo-conservative context, not just to supposedly inadequate parents but also to children and youth themselves. Strong-Boag’s book is history at its best. It is a wake-up call to Canadians to heed the failures of past efforts at child protection, to learn from their experience that “prevailing gender, class, and racial arrangements can unreasonably let down citizens” (p. 204), and to commit to a different future for their nation’s most disadvantaged children. As she pointedly reminds us, the poverty, disillusionment, and disenfranchisement of children are not inevitable, and “governments and Canadians can choose to do better” (p. 9).

LORI CHAMBERS
Lakehead University

ARTHUR PONTYNEN and ROD MILLER. Western Culture at the American Crossroads: Conflicts over the Nature of Science and Reason. (American Ideals and Institutions Series.) Wilmington: ISI Books. 2011. Pp. xiv, 412. $34.95.

This book is a vigorous assault on relativism and its disastrous intellectual and social effects presented as a history of American thought. Although I agree with the views of Arthur Pontynen and Rod Miller in large measure, their text is deeply flawed. First, it is painfully redundant. By reiterating the same few assertions on nearly every page, the authors exasperate even the most sympathetic reader.

Second, the authors’ overarching categories of “the classical-Judeo-Christian,” “the Anglosphere,” and “the modernist-postmodernist” are problematic not only in their conflation of the classical and the Christian but, more importantly, in their inclusion of a category (the Anglosphere) devoid of any intellectual content of its own and defined purely by its alleged tendency to follow tradition. Not only is it folly to place a mere preference for tradition on the same footing as two well-defined ideologies since traditions can differ radically, but the authors undermine their own association of the Anglosphere with a high regard for tradition by demonstrating conclusively that the Anglosphere’s intellectual class has abandoned its past allegiance to the classical-Judeo-Christian tradition for modernism-postmodernism.

Third, although this volume is marketed as a history of American thought and culture, it is nothing of the sort. Not only are the central figures—Plato, Aristotle, St. Augustine, Isaac Newton, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Immanuel Kant, and G. F. W. Hegel—all European, but the authors make little effort to trace the precise ways in which the few American thinkers they discuss were influenced by, and departed from, these Europeans. Pontynen and Miller explore only the thought of select New Englanders—Jonathan Edwards, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Charles S. Peirce, William James, and John Dewey—drawing exclusively on Paul K. Conkin’s Puritans and Pragmatists: Eight Eminent American Thinkers (1968), a book extensively cited and quoted throughout the volume. Otherwise, the choice of subject matter is often eccentric, including the Marquis de Sade and buildings and paintings of dubious significance. There is almost no discussion of the various theologies of American denominations or of the political theories of the founders and no mention at all of any American Romantic other than Emerson, of any economist, or of most modern American intellectuals.

Fourth, there are far too few endnotes to support the large array of asserted facts, and these notes almost always refer to secondary sources. To some extent, a reliance on secondary sources is necessary in a work of this breadth, but the authors carry that reliance to extremes.

Fifth, Pontynen and Miller are imprecise in their use of certain terms. Newton is continually derided as “a deist,” even though the authors acknowledge that he believed God not only created the universe but sustained it, a belief that contradicts the fundamental tenet of deism. The authors also refer to “Puritans” and “Puritanism” far too late in the historical record, even using the latter term once (p. 30) in reference to nineteenth-century evangelical abolitionists.

These flaws are unfortunate because there is nobility in Pontynen and Miller’s advocacy of the free and responsible pursuit of objective truth tempered by the humble recognition that complete success in such an endeavor is impossible for mere mortals, and there is wisdom in their argument that the postmodernists' complete denial of the existence of objective truth leads inexorably to violence and totalitarianism. If there is no such thing as objective truth, then all opinions are equally valid, and society becomes nothing more than a battleground between groups organized around similar preferences, eventuating in a victor who must rule by force alone. But although the authors' hearts are in the right place, that quality alone is insufficient in a work of this breadth. While Pontynen and Miller should be congratulated for aiming high in an age dominated by trivial, overspecialized works, the book's profound flaws weigh it down too significantly for it ever to take flight.

CARL J. RICHARD

University of Louisiana at Lafayette

DAVID F. HOLLAND. Sacred Borders: Continuing Revelation and Canonical Restraint in Early America. (Religion in America Series.) New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. 286. $65.00.

In this book, David F. Holland demonstrates clearly that not only have the American descendants of the Protestant Reformation continued to argue for sola scriptura (the sole authority of the Bible) and the effects such a principle ought to have on one's life, but they have also contentiously debated both who is rightfully an heir to this Protestant slogan and what counts as the scriptures to which they agree to submit. The subject makes for an engaging story—one that Holland narrates adroitly as he ranges from Puritans to Mormons, Unitarians, Shakers, and Transcendentalists—demonstrating that even as the leaders of these respective movements blazed diverse trails through the canonical borderlands, they nearly always did so with an overwhelming concern for the character of a God who speaks.

Focusing specifically on the intellectual contests for canonicity in early America, Holland begins by locating the ways in which some of the earliest Americans wrestled with the needs for and the problems of an open canon. Puritans, such as Thomas Hooker, were both "empowered and constrained" in their approach to the writings they deemed scriptures (p. 31). Though these early New Englanders resolved the question by declaring the canon closed, even the next generation was not convinced that they were correct. In fact, as demonstrated from the writings of prominent intellectuals like Jonathan Edwards, Thomas Paine, and Benjamin Franklin this "canonical pressure was chronic rather than acute" (p. 85). Evangelicals wrestling with the revivals of the eighteenth-century awakenings and desists alike explored these canonical borderlands.

As the colonial era gave way to the nineteenth century, Holland maintains, a "strictly closed canon" created the "interpretative space" necessary to allow "a particular idea of religious freedom" to flourish (p. 94). With Thomas Jefferson leading the charge, conservative and progressive theologians talked about the canon. These conversations, based on a commitment to religious freedom, "opened the door for prophetic voices and placed an even greater onus on the canon's closure," making the paradox of a closed canon even more pronounced (p. 122). Such a contradiction only grew through the era of the U.S. Civil War, as Shakers, Mormons, Millerites, and Transcendentalists made significant contributions to the nation's history. As seen in the writings of Joseph Smith, Ann Lee, and William Ellery Channing, America's religious leaders "straddled the canonical border" (p. 166). As they dealt with the tension of a God who speaks to believers, these American originals fought for the character of this God.

As is often the case with intellectual history, Holland's fine study often leaves one wondering to what degree the ordinary members of a given Shaker, Mormon, or Unitarian community of faith concerned themselves with battles over the place of scripture in their respective traditions. Perhaps these "sacred borders" were barely sacred for the Mormon devotee migrating west with her family or the Millerite waiting expectantly for the second coming of his God. It is possible these believers were living out their faith simply in a world rife with contradictions. The extent to which the questions of canon mattered to such early Americans might be hard to trace in an analysis like this one, but this problem seems to be at least part of Holland's point as he strives, mainly successfully, to "enrich our comprehension of the human story" (p. 218).

In the end, this book offers an innovative and insightful look into both the geneses and evolutions of American religions and American history more broadly. Arguing that one cannot truly understand the history of American religion without considering canonical borderlands (p. 86), Holland reconstructs the ways in which some American believers ventured not only into a physical wilderness but also into sacred frontiers that their spiritual forebears had hardly expected but had fought diligently over—not because the words they spoke mattered, but because these people of faith knew that their God was one who speaks. Since divine words mattered, they needed to be heard and, as Holland deftly reminds his readers, sometimes fought over.

RICHARD A. BAILEY
Canisius College

ELIZABETH A. CLARK. Founding the Fathers: Early Church History and Protestant Professors in Nineteenth-Century America. (Divinations: Rereading Late Ancient Religion.) Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 2011. Pp. x, 561. $69.95.

In this book, one of America's foremost historians of the early church goes back to her roots. In the first sentence, Elizabeth A. Clark asks "How [did] the study of early Christian history and theology become instantiated as a discipline in four nineteenth-century Protestant seminaries?" (p. 1). Her answer takes readers on a brilliantly imagined, carefully organized journey through the minds and lives of six American professors, spanning two continents and a century of scholarship. The founding of the disciplinary study of the church fathers, she finds, emerged only slowly, in a manner contingent upon international trends and national politics, but also the availability of books, the demands of teaching, and the idiosyncratic agendas of individuals—with on-the-ground factors weighing as much as the evolution of theology and historical inquiry. This is not your grandfather's intellectual history.

Methodologically, Clark's book continues the trajectory of her scholarship on history and historiography, incorporating elements of literary criticism and networking theory as well as elements of curriculum history and microhistory. Clark examines church history not only in the conception but in the enactment. Her subjects include Samuel Miller (1769–1850) at Princeton Theological Seminary; Henry B. Smith (1815–1877), Roswell D. Hitchcock (1817–1887), and Philip Schaff (1819–1893) at Union Theological Seminary; George Park Fisher (1827–1909) at Yale Divinity School; and Ephraim Emerton (1851–1935) of Harvard Divinity School. For each man, Clark reconstructs a rich and complex intellectual landscape, critically analyzing published and unpublished writings, class notes, personal and institutional libraries, textbooks, institutional trends, and biographical information. While six men do not a discipline make, Clark situates each within a broader context and ingeniously interlocks them in a chronological arc.

With these tools and materials in hand, Clark demarcates her investigation into three parts. First, she analyzes the “infrastructure” of church history, examining the institutional and material constraints that shaped Protestant Americans' exceptional historical orientation toward patristics (the study of early church writings). Second, the book explains how church history developed in America because of, and despite, the influence of German scholarship on the one hand and the development of the broader field of American academic history on the other. Third, Clark moves her focus to particular topics within church history: the rise of hierarchy; Roman Catholicism; asceticism, marriage, women, and family; and the meaning of St. Augustine.

So how was the historical study of the church fathers founded? Historians already understand the broad answer. As colleges and universities shifted from places to train ministers to centers of reasoned inquiry based on available evidence, theologians had to learn to think like historians. It is in the particulars of this transformation that Clark's book shines. These men were limited by their education, by the books at hand, by their institutions, and most of all by their beliefs. They recognized the threat of modern historical inquiry emanating from Germany, yet selectively incorporated that scholarship when it matched their denominational commitments. They sometimes shifted those positions on specific topics, such as the significance of Augustine or the nature of Mary, as events in their own day demanded. Yet they all sheltered the New Testament, in part or whole, from the full force of reasoned inquiry.

Taken as an individual, each professor had his own understanding of the meaning and purposes of history as it applied to patristics. Compared over time, the views of these men show a movement toward (but not into) our own age, in which nothing is, as they say, sacred.

If these findings might seem iconoclastic, Clark infuses the study with an uncharacteristically progressive narrative. “As builders of a discipline and of institutions,” she concludes, “the professors offered remarkable service” (p. 345). That service, she argues at several points, meant not only founding her discipline, but “pioneering” the development of graduate-level scholarship in the humanities in the United States. For all of their parochialism, she argues, these men achieved a noble victory.

This whiggish narrative orientation is surprising. Clark critiques the problem of narrativity within the professors' own works, dissecting their constructions of early church history around themes of Christian declension and progress. Given Clark's stature as a lifelong inhabitant of the cutting edge of the field, her enthusiasm is understandable on a personal level yet paradoxically old-fashioned as an historical argument. The second half of her claim—that nineteenth-century seminaries were pioneers of graduate-level humanities—is a stretch. Not only does it introduce problematic categories like “graduate-level” and “humanities,” but it raises questions of causation that this lovely study of six professors across a hundred years cannot answer.

In its creative methodology and deep analysis, however, this book contributes to historical scholarship within many fields. Understood within Clark's oeuvre, it delights.

BENJAMIN JUSTICE
Rutgers University

ANN OSTENDORF. Sounds American: National Identity and the Music Cultures of the Lower Mississippi River Valley, 1800–1860. (Early American Places.) Athens: University of Georgia Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 250. Cloth $69.95, paper $24.95.

In this book Ann Ostendorf attempts to detail how Americans hashed out their concerns over national identity in the early national and antebellum periods through contestations over music ways. Her central argument is that “the creation and consumption of ethnic music genres” functioned for early Americans as “a cultural mechanism through which safe encounters could be facilitated between previously unfamiliar people” (p. 172). She focuses on the music cultures of the lower Mississippi River Valley, considering that region central to the formulation of U.S. national identity because of its overlapping imperial histories and its much-acknowledged diversity during the period.

Music critics and consumers mined performance practices for raw material and created the ethnic labels and categories that Ostendorf contends helped them mitigate their anxieties that the musical cultures of the United States neither measured up to those of Europe nor provided the new nation with a coherent and unifying national identity. Specific sites of musical production and provocation include, among others, the so-called “war of the quadrilles” waged between francophone contre-danseurs and anglophone country dancers in the wake of the Louisiana Purchase; the parlors of well-heeled Louisiana plantation families, where children of the elite received music instruction from German, Italian, and French immigrants; and the religious celebrations and traditions of Christian Choc-taws, enslaved African Americans, and European immigrants.

These are rich sites indeed, but the book’s analysis of them is often saddled with imprecise historical and conceptual framing. In what amounts to three chapters of introductory material, Ostendorf defines terms, delineates the scope of the study, and details the anxieties of cultural elites from Thomas Jefferson to Margaret Fuller. When Ostendorf begins to tackle the case studies, however, the motives and interests of the often-unnamed cultural commentators remain unclear. Throughout the study, the active agents of the processes of categorization and ultimate commodification so crucial to national cohesion are insufficiently described as “the population of the lower Mississippi Valley,” “the people,” “the public,” “witnesses,” and “the consumer” or remain concealed within passive-voice sentence construction (pp. 144–145). A more disciplined discussion of the emergence of public listening practices, the establishment of critical categories of value, and the circulation of music and musicians—such as that achieved by Daniel Cavicchi’s Listening and Longing: Music Lovers in the Age of Barnum (2011) for the mid-nineteenth century or Karl Hagstrom Miller’s Segregating Sound: Inventing Folk and Pop Music in the Age of Jim Crow (2010) for the early twentieth century—might have facilitated more sustained and productive close readings of musical production and consumption.

Although Ostendorf draws on a rich body of sources, including newspaper accounts of musical performances, travel writing, personal records, and sheet music among others, music and its sounds often take a back seat. The study’s emphasis on a vaguely defined group of critics leaves little room to consider how performers (who seldom carry the status of “cultural commentator” or “intellectual” in this analysis) and listeners might blend musical styles and draw from their varied contexts to achieve novel American “sounds.” Readers hoping to gain insight into the critical and musical contexts for the eventual emergence of performance idioms and industry genres such as ragtime, jazz, and blues—all of which can trace their origin to the Mississippi River Valley—will be disappointed, as will readers hoping for close analyses of period orchestrations and performances.

Throughout, the book is muddled in its conception and deployment of “ethnicity” and “race.” Although Ostendorf takes pains in her introduction to define and distinguish these concepts, she does not adequately appropriate them for her purposes. Thus, her subsequent analysis tends to conflate many different varieties of “difference.” Instead of relying so heavily on twentieth-century concepts of ethnicity and discourses of “otherness,” she may have more fruitfully approached her historical actors as sincere readers of Sir Walter Scott and Josiah Nott and considered them in terms of the nationalisms and racisms of the period.

The book under review presents the argument and source material in ways that collapse historical transformations. It creates a composite picture of the early national and antebellum periods rather than situating musical culture within a more dynamic political and economic framework. This tendency leads to a series of puzzling claims in the book’s conclusion. Here, Ostendorf intimates that a “more forceful national culture,” with a more coherent and univocal national music, might have “been able to prevent the divisions threatening the United States in 1860” (p. 176)—a statement that will appear misguided to those engaged with the historiography of U.S. slavery, the politics of expansion, and the growing sectional crisis.

In short, early national music culture is a rich and generative topic that would have benefitted from a more precise conceptual framing and a more rigorous historical contextualization.

SHIRLEY E. THOMPSON

University of Texas at Austin

BEVERLY C. TOMEK. Colonization and Its Discontents: Emancipation, Emigration, and Antislavery in Antebellum Pennsylvania. (Early American Places.) New York: New York University Press. 2011. Pp. xxiii, 296. $39.00.

In this book Beverly C. Tomek describes a complicated network of antislavery organizations and individuals in antebellum Pennsylvania. She focuses on the role of colonization within this environment. Colonizationists promoted the settlement of blacks in Africa, including free blacks and blacks who were conditionally freed upon their agreement to move there. Contrary to the commonly held view that colonization did not constitute an antislavery movement, the author argues that “colonization, at least in Pennsylvania . . . was an antislavery movement and remained a key part of the antislavery landscape throughout the nineteenth century” (p. 1). Based primarily on the papers of leading antislavery organizations, Tomek examines a broad range of ideas within the movement.

The first chapter reviews the history of the Pennsylvania Abolitionist Society (PAS) up to 1817, the founding year of the American Colonization Society (ACS). Antislavery efforts in early Pennsylvania were motivated by various concerns, including moral objections to slavery and a fear of insurrection. Generally, abolitionists hoped to keep the colony’s black population small by limiting the importation of slaves; only gradually did they begin to concentrate on emancipation and, finally, on the uplifting of the black community. Early abolitionists embraced social conditioning in a sincere quest to prove to whites that “free blacks would not destroy society” (p. 30). The fact that black leaders supported these efforts contributed to “fairly smooth race relations early on” (p. 31).

Chapter two examines the emergence of colonization as an increasingly acceptable approach to the problem of slavery. After around 1800, an increase in the black population, an economic slump, and scarcity of jobs contributed to a rise in racial animosity. By 1830, the ACS had become a major player within the antislavery movement. The colonizationists’ success stemmed in part from their ability to convince many northern whites that the growing numbers of poor and incarcerated blacks, racial mixing, and the possibility of blacks seeking revenge posed serious threats.

The next five chapters focus on five leading abolitionist figures in Pennsylvania to illustrate the range of motives and agendas within the colonization movement. Tomek explores Mathew Carey’s ideas and activities to show the connections between colonization and political and economic nationalism. Carey, a former PAS member, argued that colonization would benefit free blacks as well as white America. The humanitarian agenda of the ACS is examined through the ideas of Elliott Cresson. Reformers like him were drawn to the ACS by the organization’s promise to “free slaves and civilize Africa” (p. 95). They argued that colonization offered slave owners a safe way to get rid of their slaves while at the same time using the colony as a showcase of black potential. While many colonizationists held strong anti-black views, some, like Cresson, believed that blacks at least had the capacity for moral and intellectual advancement.

Tomek focuses on James Forten, a wealthy African American in Philadelphia, to examine the relationship between black abolitionists and gradualism, colonization, and immediatism. She shows that some African Americans initially supported colonization, largely because they saw it as offering opportunities for black leadership. However, by the late 1810s, most African Americans had developed a deep distrust of white colonization schemes, suspecting that the ACS aimed for forced removal. Out of black resistance to colonization emerged an interracial movement that called for an “immediate end to human bondage without the qualifying provision of removal” (p. 162).

Tomek’s final two case studies focus on Benjamin Coates, a white Quaker, and Martin R. Delaney, a prominent African American from Pittsburgh, whose schemes to establish settlements in Africa emphasized economic independence, racial uplift, and black leadership. The book concludes with the assessment of the successes and failures of gradualism, colonization, and immediatism up to the Civil War. Tomek shows that, in Pennsylvania, the three movements competed with each other for support and influence for most of the period under study.

The author notes at the outset that the book is a “study of ideas” (p. 17). Her use of case studies, including black and white men, helps support the claim that the diversity of motivations within the antislavery movement was significant. However, the absence of the ideas of female abolitionists and their organizations, such as Lucretia Mott, the Grimké sisters, and the Philadelphia Female Anti-Slavery Society, all of whom receive virtually no mention, constitutes a gap in an otherwise detailed and complex study of antislavery motivations and agendas. Moreover, readers looking for insight into the views and activities of “average” citizens, including the ways in which the leaders’ and organizations’ ideas were received by the broader public, may be disappointed. Finally, the study would have benefited from more thorough contextualization. For example, one wonders how the large number of European immigrants that arrived in Pennsylvania in the antebellum period reacted to efforts to end slavery, including colonization, and how the nativist movement fit into the complicated network of antislavery organizations that the author describes. Despite these limitations, Tomek’s book constitutes an important contribution to the history of the nineteenth-century antislavery movement.

FRIEDERIKE BAER
Pennsylvania State University,
Abington College

JENNIFER HULL DORSEY. Hirelings: African American Workers and Free Labor in Early Maryland. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press. 2011. Pp. xvi, 210. $45.00.

This book distinguishes itself from other works on the first generations of manumitted and free blacks by focusing on “the relationship between the early republic manumissions and the nascent wage labor system” on Maryland’s Eastern Shore from the 1780s through the 1820s (p. ix). Hirelings begins with a preface that reviews the scholarly literature on slavery, abolition, and wage labor in the Atlantic world, and an introduction that reviews the history of servitude, slavery, and emancipation on the Eastern Shore from the 1630s through the first spate of manumissions in the 1790s. From there, five chapters focus on “Work,” “Migration,” “Family,” “Dependency,” and “Community,” followed by another chapter that examines the deterioration of free black life after 1820. A conclusion meditates on the relationship between manumissions and the practices of free labor in the early republic, and then follows the history of commerce and labor on the Eastern Shore from the Civil War to the present.

As Maryland’s Eastern Shore emerged as a thriving grain belt in the 1780s, the disruptions of war, a rise in Quaker and Methodist antislavery activism, and the loosening of Maryland’s manumission laws led to an upsurge in the region’s free black population. By the 1790s, Eastern Shore slaveholders found themselves located uncomfortably close to the growing free black communities that stretched from Baltimore to Philadelphia, while searching for a more seasonal and varied work force. Slaveholders, balancing the possibility of slave escape with their need for a mixed labor force, began manumitting slaves in unprecedented numbers. By 1820, thirty percent of the black population on the Eastern Shore had gained freedom from chattel slavery. While manumission provided freedom from slavery, the process of manumission also thwarted black aspirations for independence and autonomy. Slaveowners delayed manumission until slaves had passed their most productive laboring years while the terms of manumission kept slaves dependent on white planters.

The Eastern Shore's "mixed labor system" both blunted challenges to the larger system of slavery and structured the working lives of free people. Manumitted individuals worked grains at harvest, initially on short-term contracts but gradually on longer stints. While some freemen established businesses in the region's commercial towns, others became boatmen, teamsters, sawyers, and skilled craftsmen. Free blacks and their employers gendered grain production, and while some free women collected grains at harvest, others shunned agricultural labor to pursue traditionally female activities within the home such as spinning. With freedom and a mixed economy came the need for increased mobility. Like work, mobility took a variety of forms. Some free people followed seasonal work between town and country. Others sought greater opportunities in Baltimore and Philadelphia. And while some remained in those cities, many returned to the Eastern Shore to establish families and households.

Manumission was a prolonged, haphazard process that favored the interests of slaveholders while wreaking havoc on black families. Families frequently consisted of an amalgamation of free people, term slaves, and slaves for life, complicating efforts to create free and independent households. So did the realities of black freedom, which kept free blacks dependent on white employers. Laws required African Americans to obtain a license to market crops; vagrancy laws forced them to provide proof of employment; apprentice laws allowed officials to seize children; and the penal code encouraged corporal punishment and forced labor over incarceration. Material conditions and the prospects for greater freedom and independence dimmed considerably in the 1820s and remained that way through the Civil War. The resumption of grain production in Europe, the influx of German and Irish wage laborers, the great expansion of the domestic slave trade, economic boom and bust cycles, and heightened racial animosities combined to worsen the lives of free and enslaved blacks along the Eastern Shore.

This summary sounds familiar to historians of African American history, the early republic, and antebellum America because it is. Take for example, the central claim of chapter three, "Family." Dorsey argues that the process of manumission "divided family members between slavery and freedom." As a result, free blacks "worked to purchase freedom for spouses, children, and other family members left behind in slavery. Sometimes they succeeded, but often they did not. Families also negotiated other arrangements with slaveholders that allowed for reunification without freedom. When all else failed, family members looked for other ways to show their connectedness" (p. 62). While this claim and others like it are sound and convincing, they are also common and conventional. As promised, the book "revisits key themes in the history of the early republic from the vantage point of former slaves and freeborn African Americans on the Eastern Shore" (p. xiv). And while this monograph provides a detailed picture of the mixed worlds of freedom and slavery, it does not appreciably challenge or modify the extensive historiography on the lives and labors of free and enslaved African Americans in the early republic.

JOHN CRAIG HAMMOND
Penn State University,
New Kensington

PAUL FINKELMAN and DONALD R. KENNON, editors. In the Shadow of Freedom: The Politics of Slavery in the National Capital. (Perspectives on the History of Congress, 1801–1877.) Athens, Ohio: Ohio University Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 248. $49.95.

In this volume, editors Paul Finkelman and Donald R. Kennon examine how the presence of slavery in the District of Columbia influenced the city's social and political life as well as the national politics that took place within its boundaries. Although the volume suffers from the common fate of collections of essays in the unevenness of its contributions, it is an important addition to the literature on American slavery, especially to the extent that it examines the relatively unexplored local effects of the institution in the nation's capital.

One of the most informative contributions is A. Glenn Crothers's essay on the 1846 retrocession of Alexandria to Virginia. Crothers convincingly argues that one of the reasons that Alexandria's civic leaders lobbied Congress for retrocession, starting somewhat mutely in the 1820s but reaching a crescendo in the 1840s, was to protect both the slave trade and slavery in the city. This chronology matches developments on the antislavery flank with the growing congressional and extracongressional agitation to abolish the slave trade and slavery in the District of Columbia as the one area where the federal government had the uncontested (to the agitators) power to accomplish these objectives. Crothers also sketches a third chronology wherein the early economic promise of Alexandria, which initially had made civic leaders strong supporters of economic nationalism as well as vigorous proponents of the city's inclusion in the district, dissipated over time. Following economic downturns in 1819 and 1837, they "battened down the hatches" and adopted a much more cautious, regional perspective on the city's future. These three developments were, of course, reinforcing, which makes it somewhat dangerous to grant priority to any one rationale for the city's retrocession. Crothers details the multiple bases for retrocession, including the disenfranchisement that the citizens of Alexandria suffered as long as they remained part of the district, and yet he concludes that the "protection of slavery and the slave trade lay at the heart of the campaign" (p. 168). A safer, and perhaps more interesting, course would have been to investigate the interconnections among the multiple motives for retrocession, including how disenfranchisement must have been especially galling to a group of people who enslaved another group of people.

Mary K. Ricks's essay on the Pearl escape attempt argues that the Underground Railroad in the District of Columbia organized the flight of the more than seventy slaves on the boat as a way to reinvigorate the debate over slavery and the slave trade in the district (p. 213). The evidence is suggestive, but her account differs substantially from that in Josephine F. Pacheco's monograph, The Pearl: A Failed Slave Escape on the Potomac (2005), which highlights the role that Daniel and Mary Bell played in the escape effort. This is not to say that Ricks's version is less credible than Pacheco's, but it certainly is less cautious. Ricks is on more solid ground in claiming that a very strong Underground Railroad network existed in Washington because of the city's location and its large, free black population, and that the network was ideally positioned to assist slaves in fleeing north to freedom. Her account of the political implications of the escape attempt is also very useful in situating the episode at the center of the narrative of American slavery (pp. 218–219).

One clear oversight in the second part of the volume is the lack of discussion of the prominent role that slaves played in building and maintaining the nation's capital. Perhaps, there was a shift of plans in this respect since Mitch Kachun's article on the changing ways that black Washingtonians have celebrated the abolition of slavery in the district reminds us of their role as (literally) city builders (p. 220).

The essays in the first half of the book cover the national politics side of slavery in the District of Columbia but are less interesting because they cultivate ground that has been tilled many times before. Jonathan Earle's and Stanley Harrold's pieces on National Era editor Gamaliel Bailey might be exceptions, but Earle and Harrold examine much the same ground between them. Those two articles as well as James B. Stewart's piece on Joshua Giddings and Susan Zaeske's essay on women's antislavery petitions also suffer from an overreliance on the contrast between a southern honor culture and a northern conscience society. Without denigrating the importance of Bailey's and Giddings' conversion experiences or the extent of violence perpetrated by southern congressmen, the comparison seems overdrawn.

However, Zaeske adds an important gender dimension to the congressional battles over the gag rule in explaining why southern congressmen were so upset by northern female antislavery activists. She also provides an insightful exploration of John Quincy Adams's defense of women's right to petition Congress. (By the way, Adams also defended slaves' right to petition Congress.) But the fact of the matter is that many northern congressmen were also upset by northern female anti-slavery petitioners, as were many women in the North, as Alisse Portnoy demonstrates in Their Right to Speak: Women's Activism in the Indian and Slave Debates (2005). In addition, a number of southern and northern congressmen were unsettled by antislavery pleas regardless of whether they were signed by men or women. And, finally, with respect to Adams, his persistent failure to "remember the ladies" in his voluminous diary makes it extremely difficult to conclude, as Zaeske does, that he was a protofeminist who "opened the door to a radical refashioning of the polis" (p. 124).

David Brion Davis's essay on the transatlantic connections between the American and British antislavery movements is the most provocative essay in the first part of the volume. He introduces those connections (pp. 24–25) to explain why southern congressmen ostensibly overreacted to northern antislavery petitions (pp. 20, 33). As a "think piece," the essay fails to prove its thesis, but it is successful in drawing much-needed attention to the largely unexamined foreign policy dimensions of slavery in American politics.

As a whole, the volume succeeds in exploring many of the ways in which slavery influenced the development of the nation and its capital city. It also pushes slavery to the forefront of American politics during the seven decades between the construction of the District of Columbia and the beginning of the Civil War. It thus nicely complements a growing number of works with similar goals in mind.

DAVID F. ERICSON
George Mason University

LORI LEE WILSON. The Joaquín Band: The History behind the Legend. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press. 2011. Pp. xiv, 322. $29.95.

In 1839 twelve-year-old John Rollin Ridge witnessed the assassination of his father, Chief John Ridge, in the turbulent aftermath of Cherokee removal. Rollin Ridge ultimately blamed Cherokee Chief John Ross, actively sought revenge, and killed one of Ross's men in the process. In the early 1850s he fled to California and found work as a writer. He identified with the mestizo Joaquín Murrieta and penned The Life and Adventures of Joaquín Murrieta, the Celebrated California Bandit; thus, according to Lori Lee Wilson's new book on the subject, began the history of the legend.

Murrieta has meant many things to many people since the 1850s. He was a thief and murderer; he was an honest man who turned to robbery because of rampant discrimination; he was a character who never existed, used to attach blame to a hoard of bandits in a lawless terrain. Some have even argued that he was not Mexican. California was also a popular destination for Chileans in the 1850s. In fact, the Chilean Nobel prize winner Pablo Neruda wrote a play in 1967 entitled Fulgor y muerte de Joaquín Murieta, bandido chileno injusticiado en California el 23 de julio de 1953 (Splendor and Death of Joaquín Murieta). Neruda used the most popular version of the legend: the Joaquín who championed the maligned, oppressed, and exploited Hispanic population while exacting revenge on the despised gringos.

Wilson's book is not so much a retelling of the history as is a study of how the legend was made. She gracefully traces the evolution of the story through various biographies, like Walter Nobel Burns's The Robin Hood of El Dorado (1932), which was so successful that Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studios made it into a movie. The historians who have written biographies throughout the decades struggled with misleading sources and have often relied on oral tradition. Some, like Frank Latta, interviewed the relatives of probable eyewitnesses in the 1930s. The use of oral tradition seemed to strengthen the version written by Rollin Ridge over 150 years ago. Within the Mexican community many old California families, including my own, have stories relating to Murrieta. (My grandmother kept an old frying pan that had been passed down, claiming that her grandmother had cooked Murrieta a meal in it.) This led Chicano historians during the 1960s and 1970s to treat Murrieta as a folk hero. The prominent activist Rodolfo "Corky" Gonzales even used Murrieta's heroic persona in his epic poem "I Am Joaquín," which in 1967 became an identity-transforming anthem to thousands of Chicano youth throughout the Southwest.

Wilson also looks at the early print media in California, and shows how news was often taken out of context. Reporters often relied on local stories for their information, borrowed and reconstructed evidence, and in the process, came out with misleading or inaccurate accounts. Wilson meticulously sifts through such accounts and unearths a myriad of fascinating characters. The intimate tracing of Joaquín's band and the people who hunted him brings to life the lesser-known trails and towns of old California.

Wilson looks at a variety of newspapers and their editors and how they used Murrieta to advance their own views on society. For example, the editors of the Stockton San Joaquin Republican and the San Francisco Alta California often wrote about Murrieta but never conducted investigative reporting. Their views were prejudiced, and they simply sought to use Murrieta's alleged crimes to sway public opinion against the Mexican population. Perhaps most interesting is a chapter on Francisco P. Ramírez, the young editor of the Spanish-language El Clamor Público. Ramírez was an outspoken critic of sanctioned abuse toward the Mexican community. Although he believed all criminals should be punished, he nevertheless understood that because of the fear caused by those such as Joaquín and his band, vigilantes often caught and hanged Mexicans without trial.

Wilson, according to her own admission, "chose to marginalize the story in order to feature the voices of sources I encountered" (p. 261). Drawing on secondary sources, she skillfully resurrects a history that is notoriously absent from the archival record. While many will continue to cling to the image of Murrieta that resonates personally, Wilson's book finally puts into perspective how the contrasting views came about.

CARLOS MANUEL SALOMON
California State University,
East Bay

MATTHEW WARSHAUER. Connecticut in the American Civil War: Slavery, Sacrifice, and Survival. (Driftless Connecticut Series/Garnet Books.) Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press. 2011. Pp. x, 309. $29.95.

One of the pleasures of Civil War history comes from its multifaceted nature, as no matter the angle or approach to the crisis, compelling stories always emerge. Take Connecticut, for instance: as a relatively small northern state, far removed from the front lines of the devastation engulfing much of the country, Connecticut's role in the chaos of the 1860s has remained largely—some might say justifiably—obscure. In this book Matthew Warshauer convincingly, if unevenly, argues that to fully comprehend the impact of the Civil War—and its racial implications in particular—requires an understanding of the commitment of northern states like Connecticut to the conflict.

The strength of Warshauer's work lies in his recognition that while Connecticut's participation in the Civil War generated "an outpouring of support" that permanently transformed the state, "it would be a mistake to conclude that such dedication reflected any type of unified war sentiment" (p. 6). Politics take center stage throughout the narrative as the author ably details the always contentious battles between the state's Republicans and Democrats. An important pattern can be ascertained in the ebbs and flows of Connecticut's politics, whether in the heated wartime gubernatorial campaigns or in the failed effort to extend voting rights to African Americans at the war's conclusion. The commitment to abolition in Connecticut was fragile, accepted only grudgingly as part of the military strategy of restoring the Union. The tenuous Republican grasp on the state reveals that most white residents of Connecticut endorsed the war only if the conflict was defined in their interests, and not those of African Americans. This is not to say that the people of Connecticut did not "sacrifice," as Warshauer states in his title, but the tangled evolution of racial attitudes in Connecticut does indicate that the concept of sacrifice—as with so much of the Civil War's history—was paradoxical.

Despite the tentative nature of Connecticut's commitment to abolition, the state never faltered in its willingness to fight to preserve the Union. Almost half of Connecticut's white men between the ages of fifteen and fifty served in the Union military, and almost eighty percent of similarly aged African Americans enlisted as well. But numbers alone do not suffice to tell the whole tale, and Warshauer attempts to humanize the northern war machine by repeatedly updating the stories of several individual soldiers who faithfully chronicled their battlefield experiences. The difficulty of blending a cohesive narrative of the Civil War's military campaign with a strict focus on Connecticut's participation does challenge the reader's patience, however. The brevity of the work combined with the author's adherence to a strict chronological narrative too often results in a streamlined recounting of battles with occasional commentary from the Connecticut perspective. When compared to the sensitivity with which Warshauer engages with the issues of race and politics, his description of the war itself lacks animation.

It is to be expected that in a short book on a big topic that much of value will go unsaid. But the limitations of Warshauer's focus on Connecticut's political and military stories are apparent. There are many more stories to tell, and the author clearly recognizes this. Discussions of the African American experience both at home and in the field, Connecticut's economic growth, women's participation, the formation of aid societies, and in the war's aftermath, the evolving memory of the conflict—which ends, somewhat arbitrarily, in 1965—among others, are included, but never fully developed. This leads to occasional generalizations, as when Warshauer casually asserts that, by the time of the Civil War centennial, “black Americans were finally insisting on the completion of Civil War abolition” (p. 213). In a book premised on the nuance and significance of race as the central issue of the Civil War era, the broad dismissal of generations of activism, intended or not, is grating to read. While these flaws may have resulted from the calculation of timing the book's publication with the onset of the Civil War sesquicentennial, they are still regrettable.

These criticisms should be understood in context, however. Warshauer achieves his primary goal of reminding us that, now more than ever, it is imperative that we more honestly confront the reality of why the Civil War was—or was not—fought. As it turns out, the story of a state like Connecticut, while physically untouched by combat, is essential to a better understanding of the racial legacy of the conflict. Hopefully elaboration on the many important issues skimmed over here will come before the war's bicentennial.

BENJAMIN CLOYD

Hinds Community College

PATRICK Q. MASON. The Mormon Menace: Violence and Anti-Mormonism in the Postbellum South. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 252. $29.95.

“Mormonism is a living question in the United States . . . the ‘Mormon’ iron is red-hot”: so said John Morgan, leader of Mormons in the American South, in 1881. But the line could also be tomorrow's tweet.

A new generation of scholars, many from Mormon backgrounds and others interested simply in what Mormonism means, has come of age just as Mormonism has acquired unprecedented cultural and intellectual cachet. (Mormon studies courses have cropped up across the country and internationally, along with a few endowed chairs.) Mentored primarily by Richard Lyman Bushman and Terryl L. Givens, these intellectuals study the cultures in which Mormonism thrives and those with which it collides. Following models like Givens's The Viper on the Hearth: Mormons, Myths, and the Construction of Heresy (1997), they assess the intersections of Mormonism with American and other cultures. The book under review seeks to assess the meanings and significance of anti-Mormon animosity and violence in the postbellum South.

Patrick Q. Mason has broken loose from insular Mormon-mindedness to explore particular types of southern violence and animosity. He tells “the story of how southerners . . . encountered and then countered the perceived Mormon menace in their midst” (p. 9), beginning with a gripping narrative of Parley P. Pratt, Mormon apostle and polygamist, fleeing unsuccessfully from Hector McLean, the estranged but still legal husband of Eleanor, who had lately become Pratt's twelfth wife. It includes courtroom drama, the culture of honor, and finally McLean's brutal, unpunished 1857 murder of Pratt near Van Buren, Arkansas. By telling this story, Mason means to highlight the “nexus of a number of powerful forces”—including Victorian morality, patriarchy, and notions of honor—all of which were violated by the peculiar institution of Mormon polygamy. Mormonism, as threat to what southerners held sacred, was subject to culturally approved violence.

Mason skillfully narrates stories of such violence and excavates their larger themes. Subsequent chapters recount Joseph Standing's 1879 murder in northern Georgia, where he was a Mormon missionary (afterward constructed into a “lustful lout” by much of the southern press), and then the story of Tennessee's so-called Cane Creek Massacre in 1884, which resulted in the deaths of two local Mormons, two missionaries, and the leader of the attacking mob. Mason necessarily relies on Mormon source material to craft these narratives, but he has mined the local, regional, and national press far more than previous scholars, and he is unusually attentive to what these events meant and how they functioned in southern minds. His narratives are richly contextualized and situated skillfully in light of Mormonism in Utah as well as legislative, executive, and judicial decisions in Washington, D.C., southern Protestantism, and gender relations.

Mormonism clearly contributed two forces to the nexus of powerful influences that Mason documents: proselytizing and polygamy. The combination of those forces brought the threat of Mormonism to the hearth of every southern home, where missionaries were perceived as “sexual predators” (p. 58). Mason explores the varieties of responses to Mormonism and shows how southern vigilantism, evangelism, and legislation worked, sometimes in league, to combat the menace even as southerners debated which method worked best. This analysis highlights how, in the wake of the Civil War, Mormonism catalyzed a southern shift away from states' rights toward willingness to employ coercive national power.

Mason taps the writings of southern pastors and the press to expose the theological underpinnings of the Mormon menace. An astonishing number of pages were printed in the postbellum period to persuade southerners of Mormonism's heresies. Numerous writers were extremely anxious that Mormons were "deeply bent on propagandism" and that "great numbers are flocking to them" (pp. 120–121). What is missing from Mason's book is a corresponding chapter on the converts themselves. He features dozens of southern reports that accuse Mormon proselytizers of duping weak women and mentions a few instances of southern women converting, but readers never hear the voices of these women or get an assessment of their actual numbers to compare with the anxious reports. Patterns of conversions by location, gender, or socioeconomic situation are missing. Beginning with Eleanor McLean, women are largely acted upon in Mason's narratives rather than actors in their own right. Thus, an outstanding study of white male thought about caricatured Mormon men and southern white women lacks attention to the actual women whose bodies and minds were caught in the nexus of dueling patriarchies that Mason describes so well.

Even so, Mason's book models even-handed scholarship that is sensitive to both southerners and Mormons. It neither generalizes nor homogenizes its male subjects. Though less about Mormonism than American culture, this monograph makes a tremendous contribution to the vibrant field of Mormon studies. Moreover, given Mormonism's re-emerging cultural presence and the ongoing negotiation of its cultural boundaries, this is a timely work that is likely to endure as a significant and learned assessment of accommodation and compulsion within the dynamic "boundaries of American tolerance" (p. 194).

STEVEN C. HARPER
Brigham Young University

FRANK NINKOVICH. Global Dawn: The Cultural Foundation of American Internationalism, 1865–1890. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 2009. Pp. 428. $49.95.

Frank Ninkovich's ambitious book focuses on those internationalist perspectives of the Gilded Age that provided the "cultural foundation" on which later American foreign policy was built. He is mostly interested in "elite" journals of opinion such as The Nation, The Atlantic Monthly, and The Century where liberal opinion makers worked out a distinctive set of ideas, attitudes, and assumptions. Though they presented a minority view in their own day, such journals "were carriers of a living body of ideas that would, over time, evolve and flourish in the larger culture and take political form in American globalism" of the twentieth century (p. 4). In looking beyond American borders for signs of progress or regress, Ninkovich's selected writers balanced a faith in universal human destiny with an increasing awareness of cultural difference. The concept of "civilization," which Ninkovich helpfully compares to "modernization" in the mid-twentieth century or "globalization" in our own era, provided the framework for understanding development and progress. Among the book's merits is its elucidation of the conceptual complexity of "civilization," which could, depending on context, operate as "hierarchical or egalitarian, pacific or belligerent, Euro-American or global, faux-cosmopolitan or genuinely ecumenical" (pp. 18–19).

The book's ten chapters, organized both geographically and thematically, present an exhaustive (at times exhausting) discussion of Ninkovich's findings. The detail and richness of these chapters defy easy summary. After two preliminary chapters that establish key elements of the liberal internationalist orientation, Ninkovich examines how his opinion makers took the measure of regions and nations around the world. Other chapters grapple with how liberal internationalists understood the relative role of race and culture in explaining historical development. Ninkovich's arguments about racial thought will undoubtedly provoke the most discussion and debate among historians. He insists that his selected internationalists adopted a more egalitarian perspective on human capacity and equality than historians have generally understood. No consensus about the science of racial difference existed, and longstanding liberal beliefs in universalism and human equality endured even through the failures of Reconstruction, Chinese exclusion, and the dispossession of Native Americans across the Great Plains. Culture was more important than biology for explaining difference, which accordingly had to be considered as historical and temporary rather than natural and unalterable. Looking out at the world, liberal internationalists routinely identified religion (especially Islam) as the most intractable obstacle to "civilization."

Ninkovich's specific point about the dominance of cultural over biological explanations is well taken, though what practical difference this made is not entirely clear. Anti-racism and ethnocentric chauvinism have long coexisted, and a faith in the universal, predictable, and linear destiny of all humanity has often been used to justify all manner of oppression. Ninkovich recognizes the brutality of a choice between assimilation or extermination; the price of admission to global civilization was the "elimination of culture understood as blind adherence to tradition" (p. 164). He suggests that the racial perceptions of the liberal internationalists might improve their standing today. That is debatable. But what his intervention does quite well is to cast a more critical eye on our own era by pointing out the continuities between then and now. "In many important respects," he writes, "our contemporary grasp of the globalization process is not all that much further advanced than their understanding," and at times their discussions of "race and culture were far more holistic, and more candid, than corresponding discussions tend to be today" (p. 10).

The book raises far more issues than a short review can address. Among the most important is where the Caribbean and Latin America might fit into Ninkovich's framework. While the heavy presence of Europe undoubtedly reflects his sources, his arguments about the causal power of culture might have pushed him to examine perceptions of regions where U.S. power was most pronounced. On a different tack, I found myself wondering what if anything was particularly liberal about this liberal internationalism. Without presenting a fuller political spectrum, it is unclear whether Ninkovich means liberal in a Hartzian sense or whether he means to delineate a distinctive worldview within Gilded Age America. At different points in the book, "liberal" seems to mean simply "elite" or whatever E. L. Godkin and The Nation thought. It also seems worth noting that Harvard University Press might have edited the book more carefully and eliminated several typographical errors (e.g., "modern" for modern, "1950s" for 1850s) as well as incorrect names (e.g., "Lewis Menand" for Louis Menand, "John Moreley" for John Morley).

That said, this is a work of impressive scholarship by a distinguished historian. Its meticulous research and broad perspective—and especially its probing insights about the causative power of culture and the limits of certainty in historical writing—ensure that it will help set the scholarly agenda for decades in Gilded Age diplomatic and international history.

LESLIE BUTLER
Dartmouth College

STEVEN A. RIESS. The Sport of Kings and the Kings of Crime: Horse Racing, Politics, and Organized Crime in New York, 1865–1913. (Sports and Entertainment.) Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press. 2011. Pp. xxiv, 446. $45.00.

Horse racing occupies a curious place in American historical scholarship. It stands at the intersection of sport history, gambling history, and organized crime history—three fields that are not known for their exhaustive coverage in the literature. Today, horse racing is considered merely the poor cousin of casino gambling, but at one time it was incredibly popular among the American masses, a subject of intense interest for several elite groups, and the source of several immensely lucrative rackets. In this book Steven A. Riess charts the rise of horse racing in the United States from the end of the Civil War to 1913, subjecting this phenomenon to the academic inquiry it richly deserves.

The book is focused on three chief subjects: the ways by which New York City became the national center for horse racing in the United States in the years following the Civil War; the forces that combined to help it maintain its status at the apex of the American racing scene until a local outcropping of the national Progressive anti-gambling movement forced a cessation of betting in the early 1910s; and the reasons for and methods by which gambling, both illegal and legal, predominated during the period of racing's ascendancy.

Horse racing, Riess argues, was a truly national pastime in the period under study, one of the top three spectator sports in the United States along with baseball and prize-fighting, the latter of which also has a history that intertwines legitimate athletics with crime and corruption. Any monograph-length study of a subject as potentially sprawling as horse racing needs boundaries, and since the New York area had the most tracks, the largest volume of racing, and the biggest concentration of media and gambling interests, the author's focus on New York is apt.

Riess's study fills a lacuna in historical scholarship by addressing horse racing as a popular diversion, elite fascination, and criminal vehicle. In the last, he largely uses Mark Haller's interpretive framework, emphasizing both the importance of horse racing wagering profits to criminal gambling syndicates, and the tremendous influence those syndicates exercised within urban political machines.

In his narrative, Riess alternates between chronological and topical treatments of the material, tracing the changes in New York racing from the colonial through antebellum eras, and much greater depth, the post-Civil War period, as elites consolidated their control over racing with the formation of the American Jockey Club and the construction of tracks like Brooklyn's Jerome Park. He considers many aspects of the changes in racing over the years, particularly the constant tension among track owners, off-track gambling interests, and anti-gambling reformers. Racing tried to put its own house in order as charges of corruption (not without merit) exploded in the 1890s, forming first the Board of Control and then The Jockey Club. Due to the virulent spread of off-track, unregulated gambling, attempts to purge racing of corruption ultimately proved futile, and anti-racing forces finally succeeded in ending all betting at New York tracks in 1910. The betting interests—and the politicians with whom they allied—were nothing if not tenacious, however, and racing and betting returned a mere three years later, having outlasted the reformist push.

Riess's chief strength is the exhaustive detail he is able to lavish on his subject. Drawing from a diverse selection of primary sources, including several sports weeklies, racing publications, and anti-racing material, he recreates both the texture of racing and betting in the period and the complex political and social connections among those who promoted racing, those who organized betting on it, and those who countenanced that betting in exchange for political support. Since this is not ground that has been trodden often by historians, he is to be lauded for his devotion to the topic and the primary resources and interpretive structures he was able to marshal to complete the study.

With the historical analysis of sport being a relatively young field, and that of gambling even younger, it is difficult to place Riess's work within a definitive historiographical schema. Rather, it is easy to see that his work may inspire future research, both into gambling and horse racing contemporaneous with his study in other geographical regions, and into the dramatic rise of horse racing nationally after the 1930s. This book should stand as a model for future investigation; Riess has proven that sport and gambling yield a wealth of material for historical analysis.

DAVID G. SCHWARTZ
University of Nevada,
Las Vegas

SUSAN MILLAR WILLIAMS and STEPHEN G. HOFFIUS. Upheaval in Charleston: Earthquake and Murder on the Eve of Jim Crow. Athens: University of Georgia Press. 2011. Pp. xiv, 340. $29.95.

Susan Millar Williams and Stephen G. Hoffius have written an eloquent and highly readable narrative history of the Great Charleston Earthquake of 1886. Natural disasters, they contend, can reveal "dirty secrets" about the communities afflicted with them. Contest and conflict emerge among the ruins and, in the southern context, racial obsessions and violence influence the aftermath.

The authors certainly see the 1886 earthquake as a crucial turning point in South Carolina politics and race relations. Francis W. Dawson, editor of the Charleston News and Courier, becomes what can only be described as the hero of the piece. Hoffius and Williams render him as a forward-thinking community leader who longed to see Charleston emerge from the rubble of its past. They even view him as a racial progressive who worked to provide relief for the city's African American community in the wake of the devastating quake. The murder of Dawson, in a bizarre conflict with a neighbor, becomes for the authors a significant, and unfortunate, turning point in the direction of the city and the state.

The style may seem unappealing to many historians, if not to the general reader. Hoffius and Williams adopt the breathless tone of too many narrative histories. When describing the effects of the earthquake, they move rather quickly about town, with its effects described in snapshot fashion. Summaries of major historical change are often compressed in order to give more room to biographical material on the major characters.

Perhaps the most problematic element of the book has to do with how the authors deal with the development of Jim Crow. They rightly note that, in the early 1880s, the rigidity of South Carolina and the South's devotion to Jim Crow had not reached the state of "stiff conformity and radical rigidity" that it later attained. Most scholarship since C. Vann Woodward has emphasized the stutter-step development of the new system of racial control, and these authors follow suit.

Unfortunately, there are times when the authors come close to suggesting that the earthquake proved determinative for the definitive turn toward Jim Crow social relations. This is never baldly stated, although the events of the earthquake's aftermath and the murder of Dawson seem to coagulate in the authors' description of the rise of Tillmanism. Ben Tillman could be elected, we are told, "with Dawson no longer standing in his way."

This simplistic assertion ignores much of what we know about the rise of faux populism in the Deep South and, more specifically, the role played by the agricultural situation in Tillman's success. Other significant leaders did stand in Tillman's way, and it did not matter. Confederate heroes like Wade Hampton III even went down before the Tillman juggernaut. It is unconvincing to argue that the 1886 earthquake or Dawson's death had much of anything to do with this outcome.

This issue could certainly have been corrected with a resort to some of the wider historiography on Tillman, the 1895 constitution, and the rise of Jim Crow. While some (but not all) of the more important works on this period in South Carolina's history appear in the bibliography, they do not seem to have exercised much influence at all over the authors' interpretations of events.

Students of the era will also be taken aback by the authors' tendency to favor melodrama over analysis. Dawson does not work well as an agent of historical change, even a failed one. His Bourbon politics have to be placed in the context of post-Reconstruction South Carolina, where a struggle occurred between a paternalistic version of white supremacy and more virulent strains that would soon gain ascendancy. Given the realities of this context, Tillman rather than Dawson embodied the new path that South Carolina would take. It was a path that, as Jack Cell has argued, included both economic modernization and segregated social relations.

Those who relish a good historical yarn that presents the occasional obscure and interesting fact will enjoy reading this book. The authors know how to recreate the feeling and sense of an era. Sadly, they also encourage a simplistic interpretation of that era, one in which significant, but minor, variables overdetermine the shape and direction of the past.

W. SCOTT POOLE
College of Charleston

MARY E. FREDERICKSON. Looking South: Race, Gender, and the Transformation of Labor from Reconstruction to Globalization. Foreword by STANLEY HARROLD and RANDALL M. MILLER. (Southern Dissent.) Gainesville: University Press of Florida. 2011. Pp. xxiii, 302. $69.95.

This collection of essays by Mary E. Frederickson attempts to demonstrate that the regionalized "New South model of industrialization" (p. 4) resting on "cheap labor, anti-unionism, and occupational segregation by race and gender" (p. 3) serves as the prototype for industrial modernity in today's "Global South."

As does her previous work, the book emphasizes "the importance of the South in American labor history, and the centrality of dissent within the South" (p. 2). In six chapters, Frederickson charts the social activism of southern workers, women, and African Americans who sought to challenge the rigid strictures of Jim Crow.

Frederickson uses this by now familiar approach to shed new light on some old questions. Revisiting the Plessy case, she argues that Judge John Ferguson's 1892 upholding of Louisiana's segregation law can only be grasped in the "interracial, multiethnic, and heavily unionized context of New Orleans" (p. 14). Ferguson's ruling coincided with an interracial general strike that threw the city's elite into a panic and led Ferguson to impanel a grand jury to suppress the strike. Observing that the "labor unrest . . . seriously disrupted the order, stability, and peace that Ferguson craved" (p. 28), Frederickson suggests the judge imposed his desire for order on the city's racial system as well.

If Plessy "allowed race to divide the populace in the service of maximizing capital's power" (p. 32), female social reformers also found themselves divided by racial and class lines, even while they sought to renegotiate the position of women in the industrializing New South. The "organized sisterhood" of both black and white Methodist churchwomen, for instance, "raised questions about the social costs of industrial development" (p. 88), combatting child labor, convict leasing, and other social ills. As is well known, however, these women proved unable to bridge the racial divide when it came to questions of suffrage. But working women and their middle-class sisters often proved able to join forces to "speak to social and familial concerns" (p. 125) usually ignored by male-dominated unions and strike leadership, Frederickson argues in another chapter.

Turning her attention to southern textile workers, Frederickson points out that driven as they were by the desire to protect northern workers against runaway shops, organizing efforts "remained extrinsic to southern working-class society" (p. 143). In the 1920s and 1930s, only communists paid heed to the biracial politics of southern labor, an approach that did not really bear fruit until the arrival of the civil rights movement decades later. In one of her more original chapters, Frederickson looks at the growing presence of black production workers in the textile industry after World War II. Drawing on her interviews with black textile workers who lived through desegregation, she makes the startling discovery of a deeply rooted "informal work structure" (p. 164) and biracial subcontracting system inside southern mills, where labor historians have long presumed black workers rarely entered production jobs. To the contrary, the author shows that eighty percent of black workers "categorized as mill laborers actually held a wide range of jobs within the mills" (p. 161) throughout much of the twentieth century. "Black workers held positions in southern textile mills that required greater skill than southern industrial lore has recorded," she concludes (p. 162). Like oral historian Timothy Minchin, Frederickson recognizes that, by the 1960s, accustomed to industrial work but still relegated to second-class citizenship, black millworkers made up a critical mass in southern textile mills and proved "predisposed to collective action and union organizing" (p. 166). To the degree that a chapter of Frederickson's text represents a monograph-in-waiting, it can be found in this largely untold story of black textile workers.

As Frederickson shows in the final section of the book, newly enfranchised black workers soon faced the pressures of globalization on the southern textile industry. Immigrant workers, outsourced jobs, and foreign investment have transformed the South over the past several decades, altering the region's political economy and disrupting its longstanding biracial social structure. The idea that the latter change might "signal the demise of the Nixonian southern strategy built on white resistance to white minorities" (p. 186) seems to be wishful thinking; as Frederickson concedes, "anger directed at immigrants and supporters of immigration reform is especially palpable in the South," although some of it comes from blacks as well as whites (p. 213).

At times, Frederickson's effort to connect her essays seems a bit forced, and the book can read like a collection of disparate, if fascinating, research projects that never quite came together. Although the final chapters attempt to link Frederickson's more traditional work in southern labor history to the "struggle of contemporary workers across the Global South to call attention to the human costs of industrial capitalism" (p. 8), the connections remain somewhat tenuous, and the analogy to New South industrialization (as opposed to capitalist development more generally) seems strained. To regard the New South as the "model" for today's global capitalism overstates the case.

ALEX LICHTENSTEIN
Indiana University,
Bloomington

ERIC J. MORSER. Hinterland Dreams: The Political Economy of a Midwestern City. (American Business, Politics, and Society.) Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 2011. Pp. xvi, 266. $55.00.

It might surprise one to pick up a history monograph published in 2011 and read a forceful correction of Frederick Jackson Turner's "Frontier Thesis." After all, multiple generations of historians have criticized Turner's ideas about westward development. What can be left to say that has not already been argued? Eric J. Morser's new book, which begins by recounting a series of visits Turner made to La Crosse, Wisconsin, in 1895, manages to provide us with yet another alternative to the frontier myth. Morser's specific target is the popular idea, strongly implied by Turner and still alive in the twentieth-first century, that the development of the American West occurred without any meaningful government involvement. Scholars of western cities like Richard Wade and William Cronon have already undermined the stories of Turner's hardy rural pioneers by proving that urbanization itself was central to shaping the American West. Morser seeks to extend the corrective in two ways. First, he demonstrates that government institutions, policies, and laws played a "critical role in the Midwest's commercial history before 1900" (p. xi). Second, he believes that smaller cities such as La Crosse, Wisconsin, have been neglected by most historians. The result is an original story of the West that moves the role of the state from the periphery to the center, as Indian conflicts, commercial growth, working-class politicization, and female empowerment all occurred in a political economy actively shaped by federal, state, and local governments.

Morser organizes his study of nineteenth-century La Crosse thematically and chronologically, and each chapter reinforces his thesis of the neglected but important role of the state. This includes the prehistory and "founding" of La Crosse. Conflicts between explorers and Native Americans in the Old Northwest occurred in "a world shaped by the American state." Federally sponsored explorers such as Zebulon Pike and Steven Long argued that the land surrounding the upper Mississippi River valley was well suited to American settlement, and the War of 1812 assured Americans that the British presence in the West was over. The American state's refusal to treat Native Americans as legitimate peoples with clear and measurable grievances made Indian attacks, such as the 1827 Ho-Chunk massacre of a white family near Prairie du Chien, all but unavoidable in the contested terrain of the antebellum Midwest. La Crosse's "founding father," fur trader Nathan Myrick, also directly benefitted from the American state. Transportation projects such as the Erie Canal opened up the upper Midwest to settlement, and federal Indian treaties ensured that the West would be militarily conditioned for commercial investment. Morser plays these enabling actions against Myrick's own personal tale of courage and individualism. Other business leaders also thrived in no small part thanks to the state. Lumber merchants, largely responsible for stimulating La Crosse's early growth, took advantage of corporate laws that allowed them to spread investment risks and purchased land from a federal government eager to encourage the economic development of the West. Early railroad entrepreneurs like Thomas Stoddard, again aided by public investment, connected La Crosse to the emerging national network of railroads that became the spines of American industrial growth. The city's vigorous efforts at regulating railroads and building sustainable infrastructure, though not always successful, again demonstrate a dynamic local government.

The final two chapters move away from commerce and economic growth and into class and gender. Morser ingeniously reconstructs the rapid political rise of David Frank Powell, who won two mayoral elections in the 1880s as an explicitly pro-working-class politician. Powell was a colorful figure; he used his Indian ancestry and friendship with William "Buffalo Bill" Cody to amplify his local political celebrity. But what interests Morser is Powell's politics. He was a candidate of a third party, pushed for an eight-hour workday for city employees, and predated the emergence of Populists, Progressives, and a more active labor movement. If federal and state governments in Gilded Age America looked askance at labor problems, Powell's story demonstrates that local politics made space for such issues. Women in La Crosse also lived in a legally circumscribed world, but state laws in the nineteenth century slowly evolved to allow for more economic and political freedom.

Morser's research into every nook and cranny of La Crosse's available historical sources is impressive. He utilizes city directories, Common Council ordinances, individual diaries, and newspaper articles. It may have been useful to approach La Crosse from a bit more of a comparative perspective, not because cities its size should be grouped together, but because we might get a better sense of the degree to which the state shaped economic growth. Morser successfully proves that the role of the state in westward development is present throughout the nineteenth century, but these assertions occasionally become repetitive and end up excessively bludgeoning Turner instead of being put to use in comparison with other places. That aside, this is a fine piece of scholarship. A great advantage to a case study of a single, smaller, city is the ability of the author to tackle multiple realms of city life. Morser also cleverly introduces each chapter with different individuals whose stories add color to the narrative and reinforce his thesis. Western historians will find the book engaging and lively, and urban historians will learn a great deal about a city they probably know little about.

JOHN M. MCCARTHY
Robert Morris University

S. PAUL O'HARA. Gary, the Most American of All American Cities. Bloomington: Indiana University Press. 2011. Pp. x, 195. Cloth $55.00, paper $19.95.

Few American cities have reputations as bleak and notorious as Gary, Indiana. Wracked by chronic poverty, declining population, and high crime rates, Gary has become a national poster child for the harrowing impact of deindustrialization on modern America. In this slim volume, however, S. Paul O'Hara reminds us that Americans have not always viewed Gary as the epitome of urban collapse. Instead, he illustrates how popular perceptions of the city have changed over time to reflect deeper concerns about industry, modernity, and the course of the nation's history more broadly.

This craft of urban storytelling began as soon as Gary took root in Chicago's industrial shadow. U. S. Steel, the company that founded Gary as a production center in 1906, described its new community as a triumph of technology and the logic of capital. Others, however, viewed the city in very different ways. Many observers looked at it and saw an untamed frontier of boundless economic possibilities. Workers viewed the city as a place to forge a new sense of community in an industrial world. Progressive-minded reformers believed it provided them a wonderful opportunity to smooth the harsh edges of capitalism and help Americanize immigrants in the 1910s. What these visions shared was optimism, a hope for the nation's urban future that Gary seemed to embody.

Yet depictions of the city changed dramatically in the decades that followed. In the 1920s and 1930s, as Americans openly questioned modernity and industrialization in the wake of World War I, the rise of communist Russia, and the First Red Scare, they became concerned that worker unrest in Gary meant that their dream of social utopia had foundered on the shores of Lake Michigan. City folk certainly retained a sense of pride in their hometown's ethnic communities and local athletic heroes. Yet they could not overcome an emerging national narrative that Gary's best days lay in the past. By the 1950s and 1960s, outsiders spun new tales that increasingly rejected descriptions of the city as a dynamic urban hub and emphasized instead its steep economic decline. Commentators abandoned romantic visions of the city as a place of either industrial efficiency or frontier energy and focused on rising violence, white flight, ingrained racism, and urban decay. Even as many residents battled these stereotypes and trumpeted their city as an incubator of African American culture and opportunity, the national media arrived at a very different verdict: by the 1980s Gary was a failed city that offered gloomy lessons about the precarious state of urban America.

O'Hara's book ranges far and wide and is packed with colorful tales of Gary and its residents. His discussion of the vision that drove U. S. Steel to found the city in an effort to manage social conflict, for example, illuminates a larger tale of how progressive reformers tried to reengineer Gilded Age cities. At the same time, he populates his pages with a rich cast of characters such as Tony Zale, the tough-as-nails boxer who grew up in Gary and became middleweight champion of the world, and Karl Malden, a native son who labored in Gary's steel mills before making his mark as a Hollywood actor, that add a human touch to his story. Moreover, his call for scholars to view Gary and similar cities as fictive repositories of competing American dreams and nightmares offers a fresh way to approach urban history.

Although O'Hara sheds new light on how Americans looked at Gary, he does not always explain why their competing visions mattered or how, exactly, they may have transformed the city and its tortured history. He makes the intriguing suggestion, for example, that the story of Gary as a grand laboratory of progressive experimentation encouraged Great Society policymakers to channel money into the community during the 1960s. Yet aside from explaining how this money fueled an angry white backlash within the city, he says little about whether federal efforts actually remade the community. He leaves other questions unexplored. How, for example, did national perceptions shape corporate investment in Gary? Were these perceptions fair? And if not, what was life really like in the city? O'Hara's emphasis on urban storytelling is innovative. His tale would be more convincing with some concrete examples of how these narratives altered the lives of Gary's inhabitants.

Furthermore, although O'Hara does well to map the historiographical lineage of his project, his constant reference to the work of other scholars tends to obscure his own arguments about urban America. At the same time, his story of the imagined Gary often feels unmoored from the material history of his subject. He spends little time exploring the physical layout of the community, how its geography shifted over time, or how these changing realities altered the attitudes and opinions of either Gary's inhabitants or outside observers. A few maps would have helped him bind together the fictive and material worlds he describes.

Ultimately, O'Hara's adventurous book raises more questions than it answers. Yet even with these weaknesses in mind, he offers an inventive way to talk about cities that should be of interest to students of American culture and urban history.

ERIC MORSER
Skidmore College

PHILIP VANDERMEER. Desert Visions and the Making of Phoenix, 1860–2009. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press. 2010. Pp. xvii, 459. $39.95.

As the recession prompts Americans to reassess their romance with suburban homeownership and become more aware of the links between urbanization and environmental sustainability, the city of Phoenix, Arizona, has become the focus of a considerable amount of attention. Books like Andrew Ross' Bird on Fire (2011) and Janine Schipper's Disappearing Desert (2008) explore the environmental tradeoffs and social dislocations that have resulted from building a sprawling, car-dependent city in a desert. Phoenix appears as a cautionary tale in many of the postmortems of the post-2008 housing market meltdown—its economy a symbol of the irrational exuberance of a society built on subprime mortgages and easy credit. It is a timely moment for a wide-reaching, perspicuous account of the history of this southwestern metropolis, and Philip VanderMeer has provided one. In this work, VanderMeer expands on his prior exploration of Phoenix's postwar history (Phoenix Rising [2002]), moving back to the first days of Anglo settlement in the 1860s to explore how and why a small, second-tier agricultural hub became a twenty-first century megacity.

The central actors in VanderMeer's story are the city's commercial and political elites, and their successive visions for Phoenix shape the book's narrative. Phoenix's desert location, as VanderMeer observes, has defined the city's character from its nineteenth-century beginnings, and elite citizens' responses to the desert—to tame it, overcome it, exploit it, or accommodate it—have formed an undercurrent to its economic and political order throughout.

This book adds to, and admirably complicates, the burgeoning literature on the urban West. Unlike other southwestern cities such as Santa Fe or Tucson, Phoenix did not have a Mexican past, and it had ceased to be a Native American settlement centuries before European contact. Phoenix's early Anglo settlers sought to tame the desert by building an extensive canal system, erecting commercial and residential buildings whose architecture had little regional inflection, and planting tens of thousands of trees; largely eradicated by postwar growth, the trees of Phoenix are now starting to be restored, a full-circle development that only books of this temporal breadth can show. Phoenix also differed from other inland western cities in having an economy built first on agriculture and commerce, rather than mining or manufacturing, and it remained far smaller than its rivals for quite some time. In the postwar era, Phoenix's history diverged from that of other Cold War cities (including those it emulated, like San Diego). Although high-tech dreams shaped its economic strategy, the result was overly dependent on a few manufacturers and not built to last. A scholar of the urban West as well as of the Southwest, VanderMeer is able to draw out contrasts and parallels like these in perceptive ways.

An important contribution is the book's exploration of urban governance, particularly in the middle of the twentieth century. Building on the work of Amy Bridges and other scholars of the metropolitan Southwest, VanderMeer digs deep into the municipal reform movement of the 1940s and the political power structure that emerged as a result. This was not the typical "growth machine," VanderMeer argues, but instead was focused on making city government work more efficiently and effectively. Postwar growth in Phoenix did not always adhere to the classic postwar suburban story; highway construction came late to the city, for example, and subdivisions rose well before road infrastructure came to meet them. Surprising insights like this appear throughout the book.

No single volume can encompass every one of the many histories of a particular place, and VanderMeer has made a deliberate choice to focus on formal politics, planning, and economy. The pages, as a result, are peopled chiefly with middle-class elite Anglos for the bulk of the volume; minority groups only emerge in a significant way after their entry into electoral politics in the post-civil rights era. While Phoenix had relatively smaller minority populations than other western cities, and while the majority of its elected and civic leaders were men for most of the period covered, there seem to be some missed opportunities to trace the role of race and gender in the events and decisions VanderMeer describes, particularly before the 1960s. More focus on the individuals who made history—elites and non-elites alike—might have deepened our understanding of Phoenix's evolution.

Overall, this book delivers on its promises and presents an illuminating portrait of what Phoenix used to be, what it has become, and where it might go next. Scholarly urban biographies are too few and far between these days, and VanderMeer's accomplishment is that he takes the classic form and infuses it with new insights into the history of modern municipal governance, planning and infrastructure, and urban boosterism to show how Phoenix's desert visions became a complicated reality.

MARGARET O'MARA
University of Washington

DONA BROWN. Back to the Land: The Enduring Dream of Self-Sufficiency in Modern America. (Studies in American Thought and Culture.) Madison: University of Wisconsin Press. 2011. Pp. x, 290. $24.95.

In this engaging book, Dona Brown explores the back-to-the-land movement in the United States from the late nineteenth century through the 1980s, with a brief epilogue that carries the story into the twenty-first century. The book is based upon extensive research in magazines and newspapers as well as the papers and published works of key authors and theorists. The author cites and draws upon an impressive array of secondary sources.

Scholars including David Danbom, David Shi, and Rebecca Gould have characterized some of the participants in the back-to-the-land movement as romantics who sought a simple life close to nature for moral, emotional, or spiritual reasons. By contrast, Brown convincingly argues that many early back-to-the-landers were motivated by economic considerations such as job security and food prices. They embraced a "'producerist' vision linking self-sufficient households, autonomous work, and personal independence" (p. 51) and believed that by moving back to the countryside Americans could resolve current social problems. Brown's stance complements others' work. It echoes Richard White's characterization in 1980 of back-to-the-land colonists in the Northwest as being profit-oriented, and it actually dovetails with Danbom's characterization, in Born in the Country: A History of Rural America (2006), of many back-to-the-land ventures as being economically motivated.

In the first part of the book, Brown considers the move to the countryside that accelerated during the panics of 1893 and 1907, peaked early in the 1910s, and faded by 1920. Brown ably assesses this movement from the perspective of both intellectual and social history. She describes the work of key writers including Bolton Hall, Gustav Stickley, and Peter Kropotkin. Socialists, progressives, immigrants, participants in the arts and crafts movement, Jewish community leaders, and single taxers all advocated movement from urban to rural America. Journalists and novelists also stoked enthusiasm for it. These writers included William R. Lighton, who described his move to a farm in the Ozarks in multiple essays and books, and muckraker Ray Stannard Baker, who penned a fictitious series of purportedly autobiographical accounts under the pen name of David Grayson. Brown skillfully uses letters written by readers in response to back-to-the-land articles and books to assess back-to-the-landers' interests and motives. The letters show that economic considerations, illness, stressful or boring urban work, and concerns about manly vigor impelled Americans to return to the farm. Although the first back-to-the-land movement waned by 1920, Brown ferrets out vestiges of agrarian sentiment in the 1920s. She shows, for instance, that real estate promoters in southern California appealed to buyers by emphasizing the rural qualities of large suburban lots where occupants could plant large vegetable gardens, grow fruit trees, and raise chickens.

In the book's second half, Brown examines reincarnations of the back-to-the-land movement during the Depression and in the 1970s. Under the New Deal, government agencies promoted a modest return to the land, reflecting a popular belief in the land's potential to economically rehabilitate struggling industrial workers on part-time subsistence homesteads. Modifying the dour assessment of historians, including Paul K. Conkin, who have correctly argued that these New Deal projects lost money, Brown points out that many residents of the projects praised them—particularly those whose families remained there. At roughly the same time that the New Deal was building subsistence farms for part-time industrial workers, a small number of artists and professionals left the cities and moved to small farms in Vermont. Brown examines the writings of some of these migrants, including Samuel Ogden, Charles Morrow Wilson, and Helen and Scott Nearing.

While several historians have studied the back-to-the-land movements of the Progressive era and the 1930s, few scholars have studied the back-to-the-landers of the 1970s. Brown's scholarly assessment of this movement is a key contribution of the book. She points out that despite some obvious ties to the counterculture, this movement's participants also resembled earlier back-to-the-landers in some key ways. In an era when the cost of food made up a relatively small portion of the household budget and when the government's welfare programs created a safety net, they were less likely than their predecessors to be concerned about job security and less likely to move to the countryside in order to save money. But they did share their predecessors' desire for self-sufficiency and political independence. Despite these similarities they ignored most of the accounts and ideas of previous generations of back-to-the-landers aside from Ralph Borsodi and the Nearings. Thus, they deprived themselves of valuable lessons they might have learned from the past.

A curious omission in an otherwise thorough discussion is the eloquent and influential writing of Wendell Berry, whose accounts of his own return to the land have been widely read.

BRIAN Q. CANNON
Brigham Young University

CHRISTINE SKWIOT. The Purposes of Paradise: U.S. Tourism and Empire in Cuba and Hawai'i. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 2010. Pp. 283. $39.95.

Incomparable today, Cuba and Hawai'i were for many years "twin objects of U.S. desire," according to Christine Skwiot. Her brief, comparative, chronological study "is not about tourism, leisure, or consumerism as such" but instead takes on the harder task of connecting travel writing and tourism with the "political practices" of empire in Cuba and Hawai'i (p. 2). Borrowing selectively from cultural studies, Skwiot argues that travel writing in the nineteenth century and tourism in the twentieth powerfully shaped not only how mainland Americans imagined Cuba and Hawai'i but also how elites ruled the twin paradises. This is a tall order for a book with just over 200 pages of text, but the results are original and interesting. Indeed, the study goes beyond the promise of its subtitle to analyze not only transient visitors but also expatriate communities and their complex, turbulent relations with local actors.

Skwiot asserts that beginning in the early 1800s American settlers in and visitors to the "fantasy islands" in the Caribbean and Pacific forged mythic connections to New England's past. Drawing on those origin myths, boosters of annexation attempted to show that the tropical islands were "American enough, civilized enough, republican enough, and white enough" to join the United States (p. 28). By 1898, Hawai'i met the criteria of civilization minimally (or perhaps proleptically) and became a U.S. territory, while the Platt Amendment (1903) kept Cuba at arm's length but also made it a less-than-sovereign state. Not content to remain in political limbo, annexationist elites in both places hoped tourism would seed white settlement and thus "improve" the population. American travel writers and tourism promoters pitched Cuba as offering "a lifestyle much like that of the Midwest but with cheaper land [and] a superior climate" (p. 75). In Hawai'i franchise restriction allowed the Anglo-Saxon elite, called haole, to dominate the indigenous and Asian majority and control discourse about annexation. Like their Cuban counterparts, these "neo-Hawaiians" hoped for an influx of white settlers that never came.

By the 1920s the "multinational agents of U.S. empire" had given up the pipe dream of creating white republics in Cuba and Hawai'i and accepted, even as they denied it, that the U.S. empire resembled the European colonial system and "that the tropics were places where whites ruled and recreated, not where they toiled and procreated." Elites created "new tourism regimes" dedicated to "private pleasure" and "catering to the rich and powerful" (p. 77). The opening of the Havana Country Club in 1912 and the development of Waikiki, near Honolulu, in the 1920s, symbolized the shift. Prohibition supported the new systems by giving an outward push to Americans seeking liquor, gambling, and prostitution.

The tourism regimes faced their own contradictions. Cubans identified tourism with corrupt, repressive dictators, first Gerardo Machado, later Fulgencio Batista. Prostitution became a metaphor for the island's submissive relation with the United States, providing Fidel Castro with a volatile issue. In Hawai'i, the alleged rape of a U.S. naval officer's wife in 1931 led mainland papers to declare that the islands had "become an unsafe place for white women" (p. 132). Reacting against the elite racism that the incident made manifest, Hawaiians voted out the traditional haole Republican elite and put Democrats in power for the first time.

The Cold War cemented the growing divergence between Hawai'i and Cuba. By the 1950s, as violent resistance to civil rights on the mainland provided the Soviet Union with a powerful propaganda weapon, the United States saw "racial mixing" in Hawai'i in a new light. Statehood for Hawai'i would fortify U.S. policy toward Asia and show that Americans "accepted people of color as equals" (p. 187). Skwiot argues that favorable American press coverage of Castro's July 26 Movement before 1959 likewise served as proof of a genuine U.S. commitment to democracy in Latin America. But after the revolutionaries reached Havana—where they installed themselves in the Continental Suite at the Hilton—relations with the Eisenhower administration quickly deteriorated and killed U.S. tourism to the island.

Skwiot moves smoothly between Cuba and Hawai'i, but some readers may find that the wealth of detail makes the comparative argument difficult to follow at times. Others may wonder why the plantation economies that for so many years defined the main "purpose" of each paradise remain largely offstage. Yet the effort to connect tourism and empire pays off, as in Skwiot's apparently counterintuitive conclusion that in the matter of self-determination, the U.S. territory fared better than the semi-sovereign state: "For much of its history, the independent nation of Cuba enjoyed less political and economic autonomy and sovereignty in its imperial relationship with the United States than the annexed territory of Hawai'i did" (p. 209).

CYRUS VEESER
Bentley University

ROXANNE WILLIS. Alaska's Place in the West: From the Last Frontier to the Last Great Wilderness. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas. 2010. Pp. xi, 186. $34.95.

In this short book, Roxanne Willis attempts to unravel a crucial aspect of the history of the forty-ninth state and its relationship to the American West and the nation. Willis delineates her aims in broad terms, discussing how Americans have viewed Alaska as a "last frontier" and therefore ripe for economic development. At the same time, she insists that scholarly efforts to place the state within the framework of the history of the American West are misguided because Alaska is unique. This claim does not square with her title or the book's broad introduction; Willis's book is not primarily about Alaska and the West so much as it is about Alaska and the nation, and how that relationship has shaped the environmental history of both.

Alaska's environmental history has been closely tied to its economic development. Willis examines this connection in five case studies from the late nineteenth through the late twentieth centuries. In each of them, she probes the ways that development plans altered the landscape and changed how Alaska was seen by its residents and by outsiders. Her first example centers on the importation of reindeer from Siberia into Alaska in the 1890s, a scheme hatched by Sheldon Jackson, one-time missionary and later "general agent for education" in the territory. Jackson sought to feed what he believed were "starving" Eskimos and to build a commercially viable reindeer industry. Thousands of reindeer were brought into the territory in the following years, but Jackson's hopes of transforming the lives of natives while creating a new enterprise foundered because of overgrazing, predation by wolves, the intermingling of reindeer with caribou, and resistance by indigenous peoples to herding. Jackson's aims, based on specific conceptions of people and the land, misread Alaska's social and environmental realities. This theme of misjudging the place and people is woven through each of Willis's case studies.

Another case study centers on the 1930s, when Franklin D. Roosevelt's administration decided to resettle approximately one hundred families from the seriously degraded cutover region of the upper Midwest to Alaska so that they could establish farms, raise crops, and begin anew. The scheme seemed wrongheaded to many, given the obvious challenges of such a short growing season. Willis reveals that the Matanuska colony enjoyed modest success, but the vision of the colony's founders proved naive in light of obstacles such as Alaska's distance from markets and its harsh climate.

Willis's subsequent three vignettes focus on grander projects. The Alaska Highway, initially conceived by boosters who hoped to reduce Alaska's isolation, came to fruition during World War II when threat of a Japanese attack (as well as an actual one in the Aleutians) elevated Alaska's strategic value to the nation. Willis details how construction of the highway caused considerable deforestation, dumping of construction materials, and killing of wildlife, and she labels the roadway "a collision course of waste and destruction" (p. 89). Still, her conclusions that the highway was an "engineering monstrosity" (p. 92) and "road to nowhere" (p. 93) are not well supported. Nor does she detail any of the "wartime projects [which] contributed more to Alaska's economy and infrastructure" (p. 93). The Rampart Dam was another project conceived of as a potential boon for the state's industrial growth because of its massive hydroelectric power potential. In the end, the dam failed to gain approval from the Department of the Interior and the Johnson administration, which were sensitive to the potentially severe environmental impact. Finally, Willis analyzes the building of the massive oil pipeline from Prudhoe Bay to Valdez in the 1970s. This controversial project involved local boosters, energy firms, environmentalists, Native peoples, and the federal government and drove support for passage of the landmark Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act in 1971.

Willis's case studies are thoughtfully done, although at times one wishes for more texture and detail. A missing element in the book is the role that Alaskans played in this history. Willis provides the point of view of officials like Senator Ernest Gruening and Governor Walter Hickel and of Native peoples, but she might have worked harder to showcase the vantage point of business people, workers, and other residents, especially Alaska's own environmentalists. Although the book can be criticized, it succeeds in drawing attention to the historically and increasingly important place Alaska occupies with regard to current environmental and economic challenges. Willis shows that time and again the northernmost state has been a central stage for the country's debates involving the economy and the environment. In this new era of climate change, Alaska's place on that stage is certain to grow more visible.

MARK HARVEY

North Dakota State University,
Fargo

CYNTHIA M. BLAIR. I've Got to Make My Livin': Black Women's Sex Work in Turn-of-the-Century Chicago. (Historical Studies of Urban America.) Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 2010. Pp. xiii, 322. $40.00.

Cynthia M. Blair's beautifully researched book charts the changes to African American prostitution in Chicago from 1870 to 1930. She excels at showing how shifts in urban geography and business organization over the period affected the lives of black women sex workers.

Despite the first-person declarative in her title, Blair spends most of the book mapping the larger demographic trends in commercialized sex. In this way, her work more closely resembles social histories such as Walter Reckless's Vice in Chicago (1933) and Judith R. Walkowitz's Prostitution and Victorian Society: Women, Class, and the State (1980) than more recent poststructuralist accounts. What voices Blair does recover she employs admirably, and her cultural analysis of Jack Johnson as a cafe owner adds new and subtle insights to the Johnson white slavery case, but Blair's greatest strength remains in showing how three distinct periods influenced trends in black prostitution.

From roughly 1870 to 1900, most prostitutes worked in the Levee, situated just south of the Loop. During this period, black women generally entered prostitution in their early twenties, worked in brothels, and left the business after a few years. Black madams played an important role in the Levee as cultural arbiters and visibly successful business women. After 1900, and with the move to the 22nd Street Levee, black women lost power. The age of the average prostitute rose, showing the decrease in social mobility for women employed in illicit enterprise. Furthermore, the number of black madams decreased as white male entrepreneurs took over running commercial leisure venues. When city officials closed the 22nd Street Levee in 1912, the black sex workers who had not already moved to the Black Belt relocated and integrated into the diverse leisure venues of the growing entertainment district. This move, however, coincided with a rise in organized crime, the increased importance of pimps, and the more stringent enforcement of racial segregation that ultimately led to the marginalization and criminalization of black women sex workers. Blair writes a compelling narrative, supporting her analysis with statistics, maps, and a few life stories.

For all these strengths, the book suffers from two notable weaknesses. Blair insisted but never adequately addressed why white men saw black prostitutes as more degraded than white prostitutes. This assertion dismissed the significance of class differences within prostitution. Women working in parlor houses had higher status than those working in back street cribs, whatever their race. Black women did earn less than white women of similar status, but Blair needed to examine how status differentials problematized racial dynamics across Chicago's red-light districts. Blair also played it safe in her portrayal of black anti-vice reform. Although she discussed the desire of black reformers to keep white vice out of the Black Belt, Blair did not analyze how this imperative complicated narratives about the African American fight for racial integration in public spaces. Accepting the truisms that black prostitutes were always more degraded and that black reformers always sought integration, she missed an opportunity to bring greater nuance to the historical understanding of race, gender, and reputability. By not challenging her own analytical categories, Blair did a disservice both to her book and to her readers.

A solid but analytically cautious entry into the historiography, Blair's book succeeds as a demographic and geographic study of Chicago prostitution. Blair's careful research makes I've Got to Make My Livin' a valuable addition for understanding shifts in commercial prostitution—white and black—at the turn of the century.

MARA L. KEIRE

University of Oxford

RUTH CROCKER. Mrs. Russell Sage: Women's Activism and Philanthropy in Gilded Age and Progressive Era America. Paperback edition. Bloomington: Indiana University Press. 2008. Pp. xx, 526. $24.95.

Ruth Crocker uses the life story of philanthropist Margaret Olivia Slocum Sage to explore such questions as how women in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries constructed their public selves and the degree to which they influenced public policy. Olivia Slocum was born in 1828 and grew up in Syracuse, New York. Despite the fact that her father went bankrupt in 1841, she went to the best schools available, including Emma Willard's Female Seminary in Troy. She worked as a teacher and then as a governess until she became financier Russell Sage's second wife in 1869.

If she thought that marrying a millionaire would enable her to enter the upper echelons of New York society and spend money freely, she was very much mistaken. An associate of Jay Gould, Russell Sage made his fortune manipulating the stock market. He felt he owed nothing to society and found it difficult to spend the money he had made. The result was that compared to other Gilded Age tycoons and their families, he and his wife lived well but simply. Because she had no money of her own, the newly married Mrs. Sage had to confine her philanthropic activities to volunteerism, which in the beginning focused on "civilizing" the Indians and serving as a lady manager and board member of the New-York Woman's Hospital.

Crocker argues that it was Sage's experiences as a self-supporting woman and volunteer that made her aware of the need to expand women's educational and economic opportunities. Toward those ends, she became a patron of the New York Exchange for Women's Work and the president of the Emma Willard School Alumnae Association Council. Because she believed that educated women should have the vote, she joined the woman suffrage movement and began holding parlor suffrage meetings in her home in the 1890s.

Olivia Sage's life changed when her husband died on July 23, 1906, and left her today's equivalent of 1.5 billion dollars to spend as she wished. She was almost eighty years old. She spent the rest of her life deciding how to give his fortune away. Crocker carefully chronicles her philanthropic activities, which included gifts to organizations involved in everything from religion and animal protection to education.

This book is as important for what it says about the actual practice of philanthropy as it is for what it says about Sage. Crocker is particularly masterful in teasing out the role played by lawyers, friends, family, and employees in deciding who would get a portion of Sage's wealth. She calls Sage's lawyer, Robert Weeks De Forest, "the gatekeeper" of the Sage fortune (p. 241). He was a proponent of systematizing the practice of donating money to worthy causes. Toward that end he served as president of the New York Charity Organization Society (NYCOS), a group of elite charity experts who served as a clearinghouse for judging the worthiness of various local charities and public service organizations. He encouraged Sage to pay the NYCOS to screen letters from individuals soliciting her help. And he helped her set up the Russell Sage Foundation, whose mission to improve social and living conditions in the United States was carried out by young social reform experts.

Always persuasive, tactful, and patient, De Forest used his influence to encourage or discourage Sage's interest in various good causes. He seems to have been unenthusiastic about both woman suffrage and advancing women's educational opportunities, preferring instead that she give money to schools like Yale, his alma mater. When he drew up the deed of gift to New York University in 1906, for example, he did not write it in such a way as to assure that women actually benefitted from the donated money. And while he did not oppose the founding of Russell Sage College, a vocational college for women in Troy, he did nothing to make sure that its future was financially secure.

While Crocker acknowledges that Sage was snobbish, ethnocentric, ambitious, and self-righteous, she emphasizes her altruism, her sense of stewardship, and the pleasure she got from being able to give away much of the money that her skinflint of a husband had hoarded during his lifetime. Crocker estimates that before Olivia died in November 1918, she had donated almost a billion dollars in today's money to worthy causes, and she argues that the foundation that Sage created helped to establish the basis for American welfare state and the practice of social work. Well-written and thoroughly researched, this biography is a welcome addition to the history of women and philanthropy.

SYLVIA D. HOFFERT
Texas A&M University

TANYA SHEEHAN. Doctored: The Medicine of Photography in Nineteenth-Century America. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press. 2011. Pp. xiv, 202. $74.95.

This book is the history of a metaphor—an extremely extended, far-reaching metaphor—and the title of the work precisely encapsulates its entire project. This is not a book about medicine at all, nor is it really about photography, unless, like Wallace Stevens, we hold that "what we said of it/became a part of what it is." But Tanya Sheehan's subject is the way in which the idea of photography was shaped by medical discourses and practices throughout the nineteenth century, and thus her study very appropriately concerns "what we said of" photography. As such, the monograph contributes as much to the history of ideas, or of language, as it does to the history of images; and while those histories obviously have numerous points of contact, the author is more overtly engaged in the contextualization of photography within a variety of social practices, than she is interested in reading specific images.

Sheehan defines the parameters of the project in her introduction: "The book explores the ways in which . . . medical metaphors and models helped shape the social identities of urban studio photographers and the cultural identity of portrait photography between the late 1850s and circa 1890" (p. 2). However, it is in the final chapter, and its focus on the afterlife of photography's medical metaphors, that Sheehan is most persuasive. The logic of chronology presumably demanded that "Photo Doctors and Pixel Surgeons: The Medicine of Photography in the Digital Age" follow on as a kind of coda to the earlier chapters, but it would have made for a more thought-provoking read to begin the study of the "cultural identity of portrait photography" in the age of televised plastic surgery, and, from our own moment in history, to explore the evolution of photography's still current metaphoric vocabulary. The chapter, which is also arguably the best written in the book, gives a startling reminder of the weirdness of contemporary American relationships to portraiture, aesthetic surgery, and bodily health, such that the beliefs and practices of nineteenth-century Philadelphians, who are the subject of the previous four chapters, seem far less bizarre by comparison.

Trade and popular literature of the mid-to late nineteenth century are rich with a variety of efforts to legitimize commercial photography. Claiming special status for the medical metaphor, Sheehan argues that "the authority to manipulate, diagnose, treat, and ultimately heal the body" (p. 3) was thereby somehow conferred onto the field of photography itself. That is quite a claim, but the reader need not accept it as fully as Sheehan appears to in order to find this work fascinating for its local detail. By locating much of its study in the “geographical, commercial and cultural heart” (p. 14) of nineteenth-century Philadelphia, the book invites anthropological foray into the world of urban studio photography. The first four chapters are absorbing in their close and copious readings of events, meetings, social transactions, periodical exchanges, how-to manuals, and photographic practices, all of which are associated with the rise of portrait photography and its subsequent role in racial and social construction. Sheehan’s study of the blue light craze, in particular, and its supposedly beneficial and healing properties, leads to a persuasive consideration of the degree to which such practices contributed to the discourse of whiteness. Arguably less persuasive is the claim that merely by virtue of its “material resemblance” (p. 84) to “sitting under a studio skylight” (p. 85), photography was endowed with its own therapeutic powers. Still, there is plenty of evidence here to affirm an imaginative association between the two practices, which surely benefited portrait photography in its ostensive opposition to the “darkness and disease plaguing urban Americans” (p. 105).

“The idea that manipulating a body [through the technology of photography] is akin to a medical procedure” (p. 133) is, as Sheehan notes, strikingly unchanged throughout its one-hundred-and-fifty-year history. What we need, she adds, is more than a mere acknowledgement of “the metaphorical language and concept of ‘doctoring’ photographs” but rather an assessment of the “cultural work they have performed in history” (p. 134). In other words, what are the consequences of so enduring a metaphor?

This question appears not at the beginning of the book but instead in the last chapter, by which time the reader might hope to be somewhat closer to an answer, or even a clear argument, regarding the broader implications of the “cultural work” of metaphor. And while the text makes it easy to assent to the proposition that commercial portrait photography benefited from its association with medicine, that proposition is far less interesting than the multitude of details that its study brings to light.

JENNIFER GREEN-LEWIS
George Washington University

JENNIFER BUREK PIERCE. What Adolescents Ought to Know: Sexual Health Texts in Early Twentieth-Century America. (Studies in Print Culture and the History of the Book.) Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 237. Cloth $80.00, paper $24.95.

What, if anything, adolescents should know about sex is a question that has vexed educators for at least a century. Jennifer Burek Pierce’s book shows how sex education helped shape ideas about adolescence as a life stage. Moreover, says Pierce, these texts grew out of new views about young people as readers. Sex educators believed that the printed word was the best way to reach adolescent audiences, and this required them to think of young readers in new ways.

Pierce also builds on Daniel T. Rodgers’s argument that, during the Progressive Era, the reform of American politics was part of a larger movement of politics and ideas throughout the Atlantic world tied together by trade and capitalism. Seeking to apply this thesis to sex education, Pierce explores the development of a transnational print culture dedicated to disseminating sexual health information to adolescent readers.

Pierce traces the beginnings of this transatlantic exchange to the work of French physician Alfred Fournier, whose fifty-page booklet Pour nos fils, quand ils auront 18 ans (1901) was the first effort to make science-based information about sexually transmitted diseases accessible to adolescent readers. At this time, Fournier not only had to resist opposition to teaching young people about sex, he also had to overcome fears about the physical and moral harms that might come to young people from the act of reading.

Pierce then turns her attention to the United States, where physicians discovered that once “secretive texts” could be used to prevent venereal disease while also earning a handsome profit. Fournier’s main champion in the United States was the physician Prince A. Morrow, who founded the American Society for Sanitary and Moral Prophylaxis in 1905. Fournier’s ideas were also brought to American shores through the various translations of Eugène Brieux’s play Les avariés, known in English as Damaged Goods. Realizing that “altruism required money,” the fledgling Connecticut Society of Social Hygiene spearheaded efforts to make English translations of the play available to American readers. The novelist Upton Sinclair eagerly accepted an offer to write a novelized version of Damaged Goods. In addition to showing the devastating impact of syphilis on young people, Sinclair’s version “documented the development of a print culture that made medical information available to common—and particularly young—readers” (p. 79).

Pierce shows that the most successful effort at turning sex education into a lucrative publishing enterprise was accomplished not by a physician but by former Lutheran minister Sylvanus Stall, creator of the internationally acclaimed Self and Sex book series. Stall set himself apart from other publishers by bringing a “minister’s point of view” to sex education, and by insisting that readers of different ages required separate treatises. Stall’s skill at marrying religion to modern scientific facts initially won him the praise of former Postmaster General Anthony Comstock, author of the eponymous Comstock laws that imposed severe restrictions on the dissemination of sex education literature in the United States. Yet even someone as tame as Stall eventually got into trouble with Comstock, partly because of content but also because of allegations by Morrow that Stall had plagiarized sections of Morrow’s Social Diseases and Marriage, Social Prophylaxis. Pierce uses the clash among Stall, Morrow, and Comstock to illustrate that the success and suppression of sex hygiene texts in the early twentieth century had as much to do with disputed notions of copyright as it did with censorship, especially as the market for books aimed at a young audience became increasingly competitive.

Pierce concludes that "in promoting health through reading," publishers not only made money but "influenced the concept of adolescence as a cultural phenomenon, the acceptance of advances in science and medicine, and the ways these ideas made their way into print" (p. 180). Pierce attempts to connect her work to two theoretical constructs: Thomas Kuhn's theory of scientific revolutions, and Robert Darnton's work on the communication circuit and its influence on the field of print culture studies. Pierce's use of Kuhn's ideas is unconvincing: although Fournier was the starting point for an international exchange of ideas about sex education for young people, his belief that venereal disease was caused by germs rather than people or places was hardly "revolutionary." The author is more successful in extending Darnton's work on the communication circuit. Unlike the case in eighteenth-century France, however, in the network of early twentieth-century hygiene treatises, "the roles of author, editor, publisher, and promoter were all performed by the small entities and individuals who developed health texts for adolescent readers" (p. 185). Moreover, Pierce argues that when considering the communication path for literature aimed at children and adolescents, one needs to consider the role that parents, librarians, and other adults played in young readers' access to information. She convincingly demonstrates that "the modern practice of reading guidance emerged in connection with medical and reform interests in adolescent reproductive health, before it became the province of experts on children's literature, librarians and publishers" (p. 189). Pierce therefore makes a significant contribution to both our understanding of the history of sex education and the history of print culture in the early twentieth century.

HEATHER MUNRO PRESCOTT
Central Connecticut State University

BELINDA A. STILLION SOUTHARD. Militant Citizenship: Rhetorical Strategies of the National Woman's Party, 1913–1920. (Presidential Rhetoric Series, number 21.) College Station: Texas A&M University Press. 2011. Pp. x, 303. $45.00.

In a year when Occupy Wall Street protesters and Tea Party activists disrupted politics-as-usual in cities across America, Belinda A. Stillion Southard's account of feminist dissent in the early twentieth century seems especially timely. The book focuses on the National Woman's Party's (NWP) campaign for the federal woman suffrage amendment, a campaign that featured marches, demonstrations, and, at its most radical, a ritual burning of President Woodrow Wilson in effigy.

The study is written primarily for what Southard identifies as "the rhetoric and public address scholarly culture" (p. x). The author characterizes it as "a study in [sic] the ways in which a disempowered group asserted its citizenship rights through a rhetoric of political mimesis" (p. 190). Historians should forge ahead through the first chapter with its somewhat dense discussion of the literature, to the more rewarding middle chapters, each of which deals with a phase of NWP political activism between 1913 and 1920. Southard makes extensive use of NWP papers and cites a wide variety of secondary sources. The result is a very detailed account of these bold and fascinating militant "actions." She begins with the National Woman Suffrage Parade of March 1913, providing fresh detail descriptions of the individual floats, based on contemporary reporting in the NWP publication, The Suffragist. The huge suffrage demonstration was designed to upstage Wilson's first inaugural parade. In Southard's words, it was a "mimetic enactment" of the parade and an episode that "forced woman suffrage into the sacred spaces of national politics" (p. 69). She then moves to the parades and demonstrations of 1916 which "allowed white women to adopt the authority of fully enfranchised citizens while also attracting publicity" (p. 106). As the campaign for suffrage dragged on and Wilson continued obdurate in opposition, the party's tactics became more radical, though inflected by wartime rhetoric and imagery. Southard devotes a chapter to the description and analysis of the marches between June and November 1917, when NWP activists staged protests as "Silent Sentinels," posed formally outside the White House in what the author labels "parodic performance." She devotes another chapter to the rallies of August 1918 in Lafayette Square, across from the White House, a public place sacred to the memory of American Revolutionary War heroes Lafayette and Rochambeau. The "Perpetual Watch Fires of Freedom" were ritual public burnings of President Wilson's speeches designed to ridicule the democratic promise overseas of a president who opposed democracy at home. "As soon as reports of a speech reached the women, they rang a liberty bell at NWP headquarters and marched to the park to set fire to a copy of the text . . . Three hundred NWP members marched to Lafayette's statue with an urn and copies of Wilson's speeches that promoted democracy in Europe. Page by page the women consigned Wilson's words to flames" (p. 165). Seven years of noisy opposition to the Wilson administration's policies culminated in February 1919, when NWP members burned the president in effigy. The author calls this the NWP's "most volatile and direct attack on the president" (p. 168).

Southard's study focusing on the rhetoric as well as the enactment of protest adds an important dimension to our appreciation of the more radical wing of the woman suffrage movement. This monograph demonstrates the rich possibilities of approaching social movement history not only through an analysis of the rhetoric of public addresses, but also through the interpretive lens of visual culture. If the book's written style is awkward at times, historians of the suffrage movement and of political dissent more generally will nevertheless find this a useful study of how the National Woman's Party embraced public performance to protest the continuing disenfranchisement of half the people.

RUTH CROCKER
Auburn University

JULIA C. OTT. When Wall Street Met Main Street: The Quest for an Investors' Democracy. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 2011. Pp. 313. $35.00.

It pains me to be fully truthful about the character of this volume, because I have long been an advocate of more involvement by historians in describing the evolution of the nation's financial services sector. Nonetheless, I feel an obligation to report that the title of this book is rather deceptive. It does not focus directly on the changing relationship between Wall Street and the small investor living on Main Street after all. Instead it overwhelmingly concentrates on the federal government's effort to sell war bonds to the general public from 1917 through 1920. That is a genuinely worthwhile project, and Julia C. Ott does a superb job in demonstrating the scale and scope of the massive effort. But why not indicate to readers the real subject of the text from the outset with a proper heading? I blame the editors as much as the author.

A somewhat similar promotional program had raised substantial sums from thousands of middling households to finance the North during the Civil War, but that earlier effort was largely undertaken by the private sector. The subsequent attempt, half a century later, was on a much larger scale and was sponsored by the federal government. The U.S. Treasury asked citizens to purchase war bonds, first, as a patriotic act and, second, as a sound and prudent financial decision. Government bonds, in large and small amounts, were marketed as an equal, or even superior, option to deposits in savings banks and the purchase of whole life insurance policies. The marketers left no stone unturned. The public outreach extended to a broad sector of the population—including minorities, women, and union members. The not-so-subtle message was that good citizenship included not only voting in elections but also participating directly in the capitalist system through the acquisition of governmental and corporate securities.

Prior to 1917 few households, beyond the genuinely wealthy, had owned securities of any type, whether stocks or bonds. The government's wartime marketing initiative was hugely successful if measured by the number of households (eighty percent nationwide) that invested in some type of government financial vehicle. When the fighting ended, the carryover in securities ownership extended to the purchase of a wider basket of publicly traded securities, including railroad and corporate equities.

But what exactly did Wall Street contribute to the so-called investor democracy movement? The answer is next to nothing. The elite leadership on the New York Stock Exchange discouraged the solicitation of small accounts by the major investment banks and brokerage firms. The reasoning was that the general public was too unsophisticated to make wise judgments about stocks, and most experts doubted that small accounts, with their high administrative costs, would generate profits for most brokerage firms. That negative attitude moderated somewhat in the mid-1920s; but Wall Street was still dominated by the interests of the oligopolist investment banks that catered strictly to the upper classes at home and abroad. One exception to the general rule was AT&T; it attracted over half a million stockholders, many of whom were regular customers who had decided to make a modest investment in the firm. In another exceptional case, over two million households pooled their monies by investing in so-called investment trusts that owned a portfolio of publicly traded securities. Similar investment trusts had been listed on the London Stock Exchange since the late nineteenth century. Was Great Britain the true initiator of an investors' democracy?

While it is impossible to dismiss entirely the influence of the democratization propaganda of the 1920s in the United States, I doubt if those initiatives really had legs beyond the devastating impact of the 1929 Crash and the Great Depression. Citizens in all income brackets turned sour on the stock market in the 1930s, and that malaise continued throughout the 1940s as well. I would argue that the initial democratization movement had largely fizzled; it was only resuscitated in the 1950s and thereafter. The brokerage firm of Merrill Lynch and the unprecedented initiatives of Keith Funston, the new head of the New York Stock Exchange, played key roles in bringing middle-class investors into the equity markets. The subsequent emergence of open-end mutual funds and 401(k) retirement plans solved the problem of generating profits on small accounts.

In the concluding chapter, Ott becomes very much present minded. She asserts: "Faith in unfettered finance and the primacy of shareholder returns—dogma first promulgated by financial securities marketers in the 1920s—inspired the reckless securitization and regulatory laxity of the early twenty-first century" (p. 224). No doubt this faith was a contributing factor, but the author has probably exaggerated its overall impact. For my money, the best explanation of the underlying hubris that characterized the recent financial meltdown remains Karen Ho's Liquidated: An Ethnography of Wall Street (2009). Still, Ott does identify how it all got started nearly a century ago, even if the initial movement was largely aborted.

Finally, I wonder where this volume will find an audience. I suspect it will be overlooked by the relatively small niche of financial historians, and the detailed analysis may be too technical to appeal to the tastes of most social and cultural historians.

EDWIN J. PERKINS,
Emeritus
University of Southern California

BETH LINKER. War's Waste: Rehabilitation in World War I America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 2011. Pp. 291. $35.00.

Scholarly interest in the social and political aspects of U.S. involvement in World War I has intensified recently with studies focusing on racial and ethnic minorities, the nature of coercive voluntarism, the influenza epidemic, veteran activism, and the memory of the war. Beth Linker adds to this growing literature with the first book-length treatment of disabled veteran rehabilitation policies and practices. Despite growing interest in disability studies generally and numerous works tracing the disabled European soldiers' journey home from the battlefield, scholars of the American war experience have largely ignored wounded soldiers. This oversight reaffirms the myth that the United States was "barely bloodied" during World War I, an inaccurate view that discounts 53,000 American combat deaths. Linker rightly shines the spotlight on the nation's 204,000 wounded soldiers, another largely forgotten group. Recent scholarly work pinpoints World War I as a pivotal moment for the modern civil rights movement, U.S. foreign policy, and state security practices. Likewise, Linker sees the war as a transformative period in the history of American health care. "[F]rom World War I onward, US veterans of war would benefit from a federally funded system of health care, a form of socialized medicine that the nation's civilians would be denied time and again throughout the twentieth century," she notes (p. 8).

Linker focuses primarily on policymaking, tracing the evolution of a recovery philosophy that put a premium on rehabilitating wounded soldiers into productive citizens and workers. Progressive-era medical and policy trends influenced the professionals charged with formulating federal veteran rehabilitation programs. First, many rehabilitation experts believed that an overly generous Civil War veteran pension system (which characterized old age as a disability for Union veterans) had drained the federal treasury and created a permanent class of government wards incapable of supporting themselves. Second, physicians founded specially designed hospitals for disabled children promising that rehabilitation therapy would save them from a lifetime of dependence on charity. Finally, the new workmen's compensation system standardized the benefits granted to workers with similar disabilities. Linker does a superb job tracing how these various strands of thought came together to establish a clear set of goals for rehabilitating disabled veterans. The new veteran rehabilitation system sought to remove the need for disability pensions, to imbue disabled veterans with the desire to hold a job and support a family, and to formulate a scientifically based care and benefits system that treated disabled veterans equitably.

Besides tracing the evolution of this new approach to treating wounded veterans, Linker also evaluates how these pioneers in federal rehabilitation services fell short. Rehabilitation administrators, doctors, nurses, and therapists embraced the goal of "re-masculinizing" wounded men so that they had the drive to work and marry once they completed the proscribed period of rehabilitation. Yet these same experts persisted in treating disabled soldiers as children, requiring unquestioning compliance with the goals and methods that others chose for them. Caregivers proved adept at ignoring the reality that many wounded soldiers would struggle with life-long disabilities. "Rehabilitation officials made disability appear to be a temporary physical glitch, something from which men would fully recover with six months hospitalization and rehabilitation. But disabled soldier-patients and their bodies repeatedly defied such lofty and unrealistic thinking," Linker writes (p. 141). Creating a network of federally managed rehabilitative medical and vocational facilities did not lessen the cost of treating disabled war veterans. The new system instead put medical experts, not veterans, in charge of making decisions about how to spend the money Congress allocated for their care. Rather than giving disabled veterans pensions to pay for their own treatment (the model used in the Civil War pension system), rehabilitation officials spent the money constructing veterans hospitals and hiring medical experts.

Linker argues that these attitudes and practices are not just part of a distant past. In the introduction and conclusion she discusses the rehabilitation experiences of amputees from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Just as during World War I, the wounded soldier who today refuses to work diligently towards financial and medical independence "is considered a failure, not a hero," she notes (p. 1). Perhaps most important, the refusal to confront the permanent physical and mental trauma visited upon fighting men "creates the momentary illusion that there is no human cost of war—that there is no 'waste' in war" (p. 181).

This pathbreaking study opens up exciting avenues for future research. Linker focuses primarily on the experiences of amputees (only a small fraction of the disabled veteran population), while gas-related tuberculosis and re-occurring shellshock accounted for the majority of hospitalizations in the interwar period. The question of veteran resistance to federal rehabilitation policies, which Linker touches upon briefly, and debates over disability allowances deserves additional consideration. David Gerber's insight that veterans' social identities were more than a by-product of their interactions with the state underscores how little we know about the postwar personal lives of disabled veterans. Thanks to Linker, scholars can investigate these questions with a clear understanding of the motivations and methods that underpinned the nation's federal rehabilitation system for disabled veterans.

JENNIFER D. KEENE
Chapman University

KEITH WAILOO. How Cancer Crossed the Color Line. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. 251. $27.95.

Keith Wailoo offers a significant contribution to medical history, public health studies, and health policy debate. Wailoo examines the history of cancer in the United States and the subtext of race that accompanied cancer throughout the twentieth century. He effectively demonstrates the centrality of race in constructions of disease and provides a critical analysis of how constructions of race, which informed health policy, changed over time. He also criticizes cancer experts who easily perceived entire populations in terms of one racial category, ignoring the varied lived experiences within such groups. This critique runs throughout the book and serves as a constant reminder of the fluidity of racial and epidemiological categories.

Wailoo adopts a chronological approach and opens the book with an analysis of the early decades of cancer awareness. Understandings of cancer depended on ideas of vulnerability, and Wailoo demonstrates that white women in the United States were perceived as the most vulnerable citizens. Exacerbating a civilized versus primitive discourse, epidemiologists and others believed cancer targeted a "civilized" white population while simultaneously believing African Americans were immune to cancer because of their "primitiveness." Thus, cancer awareness initiatives were laden with racism and informed by eugenics.

By the 1930s, however, the notion of white vulnerability was increasingly indefensible. Data gathered as a result of reverse migration into cities with cancer surveillance programs complicated such ideas. The expansion of public health programs in later decades led to recording incidences of cancer within communities of color. Wailoo demonstrates how epidemiology offered various explanations of racial difference over time. Early theories of cancer and race rested on perceptions of biological differences of susceptibility and immunity, but by mid-century cancer became an egalitarian disease with differences framed by social inequality. As Wailoo notes, experts clung to the notion of uniformity within a racial category and the soundness of racial categorization as a science.

In an effort to better categorize cancer incidence, experts adopted the U.S. Census category "nonwhite." This category lacked biological meaning and became, as Wailoo describes, "a perverse strategy for tracking health" (p. 103) that would have implications for many more decades. Ironically, the failure of "nonwhite" to capture meaningful data ultimately gave rise to greater consideration of social differences in cancer data. Through two case studies, one of cervical cancer among Jewish women, and another on increasing rates of lung cancer, Wailoo demonstrates that epidemiologists began to consider how human behavior, such as sexual customs and smoking, contributed to cancer trends.

Within the context of widespread social protest during the 1960s, growing evidence of a cancer disparity indicated the need for racial equality with regard to cancer treatment and access to health care. Some Americans also challenged the idea of cancer expertise. In 1972, a team of researchers at Howard University published findings indicating a sharp increase in cancer incidence within the black community. The researchers questioned why this dramatic data had escaped the notice of major cancer organizations including the National Cancer Institute and the American Cancer Society. Wailoo reviews the Krebiozen saga as another example of public sentiment challenging medical authority.

In the 1990s, epidemiologists revealed higher than average rates of prostate cancer in black men, cervical cancer among Vietnamese American women, and breast cancer among affluent and white women. By the end of the century, the public was attuned to discussions of race and cancer trends. Many Americans demanded better explanations for such cancer spikes within defined racial communities. However, as Wailoo notes, epidemiological spikes "are complex and illusive phenomena shaped by many social and biological factors" (p. 171). Although race had a more visible place in cancer discussions than earlier in the century, racial vocabulary remained limited and unable to explain such phenomena.

Wailoo calls for greater attention and consideration of race in historical studies and when developing contemporary health policy. A historical review of cancer in the United States demonstrates that race has been a constant subtext for discussions of cancer, but it has also been a malleable and fluid concept. Wailoo's history offers a blueprint for ways to consider disease and difference through a method that avoids the pitfalls of biological explanations. He instead insists that racial vocabulary be expanded to account for relationship among knowledge, power, and policy. This book is essential reading for all those interested in history and illness, and also those eager to re-theorize race and public policy.

KIRSTEN E. GARDNER
University of Texas,
San Antonio

JULIE BUCKNER ARMSTRONG. Mary Turner and the Memory of Lynching. Athens: University of Georgia Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 255. Cloth $59.95, paper $24.95.

Mary Turner was one of eleven black people killed near Valdosta, Georgia, between May 16 and 23, 1918, all in retaliation for the killing of a white landowner. Although hers was one of many lynchings during the period, Turner is especially significant because she was a woman, and because of the spectacular cruelty of her murder as described in the national press. According to Walter White's report, Turner was eight months pregnant, and after the mob had hung her from a tree by her feet, doused her with gasoline and set her on fire, they cut her unborn child out of her body, so that it dropped to the ground below, giving "two feeble cries" before someone crushed it under his heel. Then, the mob "rid-dled" Turner's hanging body with shotgun fire. As Julie Buckner Armstrong recounts, she is not the only author to become "obsessed" by this horrific event, nor the first to be at times stymied in an effort to represent it.

Armstrong defines her book as "a case study of a story, not an event" (p. 14). Particularly because of its discussion of historical re-enactments, museums, and monuments, as well as the relationship of the memory of lynching to such events as demonstrations for the Jena Six, the book is an important contribution to history. Lyrically written, it connects an impressive array of literary, artistic, and popular sources in an effort to understand what lynching means to a variety of communities.

The first chapter describes newspaper and protest accounts as framed by the discourse established by the silent film Birth of a Nation (1915). Armstrong shows how local reports that Turner was killed for "talking back" in protest against the lynching of her husband became an opportunity to represent female heroism, noting the Chicago Defender's claim that black women stayed home from work in response (p. 46), but she establishes that most used the account to draw a parallel between lynchers and the German enemy in World War I. The centerpiece of the first chapter is White's visit to Valdosta and a close reading of his account, which was the first to refer to Turner's pregnancy, along with Armstrong's effort to evaluate the truth of the claim. The second chapter discusses both the Anti-Lynching Crusaders and efforts of black women artists and writers to represent Turner's killing through the discourse of respectability, often with the figures of Madonna and child. Armstrong argues that gender norms led Angelina Weld Grimké to shelve a draft whose main character fought back with violence in favor of the passive heroine of the story "Goldie," while Meta Fuller gave up on her sculpture In Memory of Mary Turner for similar reasons. The third chapter's argument is that the discourse of lynching shifted from "popular justice" as seen in Birth of a Nation to national disgrace partly through literary modernism's "rejection of genteel aesthetics" (p. 115). Armstrong's readings of Jean Toomer's Cane (1923), Anne Spencer's "White Things" (1923), and Oscar Micheaux's Within Our Gates (1920) demonstrate that modernists represented lynching as a rupture in both the nation and in language itself. The fourth chapter moves to the present with a discussion of the Moore's Ford Bridge lynching reenactment, the National Great Blacks in Wax Museum, the art of Kara Walker, and the poetry of Honorée Fanonne Jeffers. The two popular representations emphasize gory spectacle. "It'll make you want to turn militant," Armstrong writes that the hotel concierge told her when she mentioned the wax museum (p. 158). The exhibit he refers to adds a new detail to the Turner lynching, claiming that the mob "sewed cats into Mary Turner's stomach taking bets on which one would claw its way out first" (p. 160). Such an improbable and sadistic historical fantasy deserves more comment than it receives. Armstrong explains both this representation and the incorporation of a murdered unborn baby into the Moore's Ford reenactment as serving a therapeutic function.

The use of folklore scholarship or deeper research into oral history might have added yet another layer of interpretation.

This is a deeply personal book. The author began the project in Valdosta and encountered resistance from local whites. Armstrong discusses the emotional experiences of authors of literary works, and her own, commenting that she is surprised that more scholars of racial violence "have not taken similar first-person approaches" (p. 17). She refers to her whiteness and her childhood in Birmingham as shaping how she approaches history. "White Southerners frequently remind themselves to 'look away' as the song goes," she writes (p. 154). This tension between the wishes to look and to look away captures the nature of traumatic memory, and Armstrong's choice to represent her personal reactions creates a connection with the reader, although it can also be distracting. It is not an easy subject, Armstrong reminds us; she and others have struggled to avoid sterility, sensationalism, or sentimentality. Ultimately, this book succeeds in calling readers to connect themselves to the past, and the past to the present, demanding that we all become accountable to history.

REBECCA HILL

Kennesaw State University

TRACY A. THOMAS and TRACEY JEAN BOISSEAU, editors. Feminist Legal History: Essays on Women and Law. New York: New York University Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 274. Cloth $79.00, paper $24.00.

Lawmaking orders the future, but history shapes the rule of law—and nowhere more so than in the legal rules that govern women and gender. That is the central point of this superb interdisciplinary collection of essays on history, law, and feminism that aims to contribute to "the imagining of a more liberatory legal system" (p. xi).

Feminist Legal History explores practice and theory, wrongs and rights, the legal construction of gender, and women's reconstruction of the law. It spans almost two centuries of experience, from the protests advanced by Elizabeth Cady Stanton against gender as a legal category to the signing by President Barack Obama of the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act of 2009. Thirteen essays address issues ranging from temperance and transportation law to marriage, reproductive rights, and sexual harassment; to legal aid and social work; to suffrage, military service, the GI Bill, and wage discrimination. The authors (legal scholars, historians, and sociologists) write of "micro-choices" made by men with "power women lack," as Reva Siegel notes in the foreword, and "micro-resistances" made by women with "phenomenal agency and creativity" (p. vii).

The essays reveal that the history of women's encounter with the law has been anything but a linear story of gradual progress from disfranchisement and coverture to equal rights. In an illuminating introduction, the editors Tracy A. Thomas and Tracey Jean Boisseau criticize the conventional account of enfranchisement, underscoring the “uneven” and “complex” ways that the “law has responded to women’s assertions of social power” (p. 12). The collection offers a portrait full of “contradictions, inconsistencies, and tensions” (p. 13). And feminist legal theory, since its advent as an intellectual movement in the 1970s, has likewise unfolded as an argument, sometimes bitter, among exponents of liberalism, cultural difference, dominance, and postmodernism as rival frameworks for conceptualizing female subjection and visions of transformation. The editors deftly sum up debates over sameness and difference, the liberating and disempowering character of the legal system, and the jurisprudential construction of a “gendered subject.” The essays draw on a multitude of theoretical perspectives. But according to the editors, all adopt the “legal method of deconstruction” in examining codes of gender that underlie legal rules and legal rights (p. 25).

The collection is divided into two parts. Part one focuses on law’s effect on women, with essays by Richard Chused, Margo Schlanger, Leti Volpp, Melissa Murray, Jill Hasday, and Maya Manian. Part two focuses on women’s effect on the law, with essays by Tracy Thomas, Gwen Jordan, Felice Batlan, Lynda Dodd, Mae Quinn, Carrie Baker, and Eileen Boris. Such a division, however, runs contrary to a premise of much contemporary scholarship in legal history that law at once constitutes and is constituted by social experience and everyday strife. Part one opens with a piece by Chused that draws a line between the 1870s temperance activism of Ohio ladies—which spilled out from the streets to the courts—and the adoption half a century later of the woman’s suffrage and prohibition amendments to the U.S. Constitution. Part two closes with a piece by Boris that focuses on the right of equal pay as it exposes the blind spots in contemporary anti-discrimination law. Notably, both essays invalidate linear stories of progress, suggesting that the division between the theme of “Legalizing Gender” in part one and that of “Women’s Transformation of the Law” in part two obscures the very intersections between the choices of lawmakers in courts and legislatures and the resistance of women in public and private that take center stage in the collection.

It is the splendid essay by Boris on pay discrimination, gender, and race that distills the paradoxes of feminist legal history. Boris traces the efforts of Lilly Ledbetter, a floor manager in an Alabama branch of the Goodyear Tire Company, to secure equal pay by filing a claim with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission in 1998 and pursuing it under Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act all the way up to the U.S. Supreme Court. The story ends not with Ledbetter’s 2007 defeat in the Supreme Court but rather with congressional anti-discrimination legislation: the 2009 Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act. Yet Boris lays bare the limits of progress. She sets the apparent triumph of gender equity against the law of fair employment, focusing on contradictions in the rulings of Justice Ruth Bader Ginsberg. In particular, Boris juxtaposes Ginsberg’s scorching dissent in Ledbetter with her silent agreement in Long Island Care at Home v. Coke (2007), where the Court denied the guarantees of the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) to home health-care workers, who are mainly women of color laboring long days for low wages.

The Obama administration has proposed new rules extending the FLSA’s reach to the home health-care industry. But the analysis offered by Boris testifies to the longer and deeper ambiguities marking the history of women’s aspirations for equality at law. “That Ledbetter conformed to the model woman of liberal feminism, a trailblazer in a male job, whereas the Jamaican immigrant home-care aide Evelyn Coke engaged in work conflated with unpaid labor of wives and mothers, and long associated with servile status,” Boris writes, “highlights the problem of which work and which women count in equity discourse” (p. 252).

AMY DRU STANLEY
University of Chicago

TIMOTHY R. BUCKNER and PETER CASTER, editors. Fathers, Preachers, Rebels, Men: Black Masculinity in U.S. History and Literature, 1820–1945. (Black Performance and Cultural Criticism.) Columbus: Ohio State University Press. 2011. Pp. ix, 272. $49.95.

What is particularly daunting for editors of anthologies about black masculinity is selecting a variety of essays that are distinctive yet speak to each other on a meta-level. Timothy R. Buckner and Peter Caster’s new volume is largely successful in this regard.

The editors wisely position the relevance of this anthology within the presidency of Barack Obama. Placed between the scathing, spurious ramblings of Houston A. Baker, Jr., and the racist propaganda of the Tea Party and Birther movement, Riché Richardson claims that Obama has “shattered the conventional racial (and arguably racist) fantasy of manhood in the national imaginary as white” (p. 247). Thus, Obama as outsider, as one who challenges conventional definitions of leadership, has much in common with many of the subjects of this anthology. The “lasting power of racial caricatures” and their “co-optation in minstrelsy as a largely white imagination of blackness” binds many of the critics of Obama to past insults of black manhood (p. 4).

The essays follow an appropriate chronological progression. Jeff Forret examines the relationship between slave men, white southern notions of honor, and white masculinity in the antebellum South. He describes this as a process of negotiation in which black men reverted to the southern tradition of violence when their honor was threatened. The author’s consideration of slave men defending their masculinity within the context of white manhood demonstrates the interrelationship between the two racialized constructs. In the following chapter, Buckner discusses the middling position of black barber William Johnson, who interacted with both white and black communities in his Natchez barbershop. As a free man of color in the Deep South, Johnson's life was regulated just a little less than a slave's, but the barber was also "essentially performing masculinity in ways usually reserved for white men" through his land ownership, hiring of black and white workers, and overall economic success (p. 45). Buckner demonstrates how Johnson "performed" black masculinity in a narrow self-determined way and often castigated mentees who did not follow his rules. The final antebellum essay by Erica L. Ball considers broader class definitions of black respectability among northern African American men. Not just determined by the religious sphere, the emerging black middle-class model of manhood Ball describes was inscribed in the northern black press and through literary societies.

Julius Bailey examines the role of the black minister in the nineteenth-century African Methodist Episcopal Church. In the middle of the century, both men and women led congregations and delivered sermons, but a consolidation of power by a contingent of black male ministers subsequently limited the role of black women. Two separate essays consider the career and racial politics of the influential nineteenth-century illustrator Thomas Nast. Fiona Deans Halloran demonstrates Nast's genuine sympathy for African American men in his Civil War and Reconstruction illustrations. A positive element of this, and the subsequent chapter is reproductions of Nast's original illustrations; thus, the reader can compare the authors' interpretations to the actual primary source documents. Halloran delicately describes Nast's genuine concern for African American men but also his presupposition of black inferiority. He doubted that black men could ever be the social or political equals of white men. Caster also considers Nast, but as a minor subject. Instead, he regards African American author Charles W. Chesnutt and his relationship to widespread racist caricatures in publications such as Harper's Weekly. Seeking to publish in such journals, which usually assaulted black men, Chesnutt attempted to subvert and overturn racist portrayals through his fiction; as a result, the talented author largely lost his writing career.

Simone Drake and Charity Fox each contribute individual chapters on the life and autobiography of Nat Love. Cowboy, train porter, and middle-class family man, Love bragged in his autobiography, The Life and Adventures of Nat Love (1907), that he was the original Deadwood Dick. Dick was the inspiration for highly popular dime novels in the late 1800s and was considered white. Literary scholar Drake reads agency into Love's autobiography, even if denying part of its historical credibility. She focuses not only on the text but on the photos accompanying it, which illustrate a visual rhetoric of self-assertion and self-definition. Fox reads the autobiography against the grain as a satirization of early twentieth-century idealized manhood. As cowboy or porter, Love claimed that he could perform all of the tasks that a white man could, and perhaps in a superior fashion.

The final chapters consider two giants of the early twentieth century: W. E. B. Du Bois and E. Franklin Frazier. Colleen O'Brien looks at how Du Bois's 1909 biography of John Brown demonstrated cross-racial and cross-national patterns of revolution, while Malinda Elaine Lindquist reinterprets Frazier's sociological work, focusing on black family manhood.

The one complicating factor of this collection is how loosely the essays hold together. Individually, each of the chapters is formidable scholarship and begs for further research to be completed on the historical subject being discussed. But the parameters of time and discipline are perhaps a little too large for consideration in this study. As historians we have now moved to a phase of scholarship on black masculinity where topical and selective studies need to be completed.

GERALD R. BUTTERS, JR.
Aurora University

ANASTASIA C. CURWOOD. Stormy Weather: Middle-Class African American Marriages between the Two World Wars. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 2010. Pp. xiv, 196. $35.00.

In her book, Anastasia C. Curwood argues that black middle-class and aspiring middle-class couples confronted public and private tensions as they aimed to make their marriages both personally fulfilling and politically useful to the broader goal of racial advancement. Curwood situates her study within the context of interwar cultural upheaval when black couples negotiated new sexual and marital norms, urban migration, the emergence of a "New Negro" ideal, and intraracial debates over the course African American marriages should take. While Curwood successfully lays out the new marital ideals that emerged during this time period, she is more interested in how individual husbands and wives navigated public expectations of private life, oftentimes in ways that contradicted one another's expectations. Arguing that the historical focus on African American racial struggles has overshadowed investigations of subjects' personal lives, she contributes to the existing historiography of modern American marriage and African American private life as she demonstrates "the heterogeneity of those lives" (p. 7).

Curwood effectively highlights the shift from turn-of-the-century African American marriages, marked by Victorian notions of decorum, to those of the post-World War I years, characterized by a more public discussion of sexuality and changing gender roles. Middle-class couples viewed their prewar unions in social and political contexts, with the communal goal of racial advancement placed above either partner's individual satisfaction. Men and women embraced a gendered order in which the male served as public voice and head of household while the female accepted her role as helpmate and domestic manager. In the aftermath of the war, with a new cultural frankness regarding sex, a growing focus on companionate marriage, and the emergence of mass culture, modern views collided with traditional expectations. Couples identifying with the New Negro ideal—"racially aware, militant, and fearless" (p. 32)—embraced the concept of unions marked by individual happiness and sexual fulfillment as distinct from those designed to serve primarily the goal of racial uplift.

Even among those who accepted the idea of a modern marriage, however, debates arose over the nature of the appropriate fulfillment of marital roles. Relying on the views and publications of labor leader A. Philip Randolph, sociologist E. Franklin Frazier, and novelist Jean Toomer, Curwood argues that the masculine ideal of the New Negro marriage firmly placed the husband as the dominant financial and emotional force within modern unions. However, many notable women, such as activist Amy Jacques Garvey, novelist Zora Neale Hurston, and lawyer Sadie Alexander embraced more active political and economic roles as they struggled to reconcile personal desire and financial necessity (especially during the Depression years) with the idealized version of wifehood. Curwood's evaluation of the varied and often contested understandings of gender highlights the disconnect between the publicly touted ideal and the private realities of New Negro marriages. For example, while Randolph, Frazier, and Toomer all advocated on behalf of masculine authority and underscored the importance of male breadwinning, each man relied—at one time or another—on the financial support of his wife. The dominance of the male figure was often tenuous at best.

Curwood accentuates this point through the investigation of her most unique and revealing sources: her paternal grandparents' written correspondence from 1935 to 1949 (the bulk of which comes from 1935 to 1937). The challenge, of course, is that she must rely primarily on one couple's correspondence. But her reading of the letters is nuanced and thoughtful, and she successfully situates James and Sarah Curwood in their time and place. In so doing, she effectively draws out the ways in which the Curwoods' relationship reflected the challenges of New Negro couples more broadly. Socio-economic class, education, skin color, regional affiliation, and family background contributed to the differences in her grandparents' expectations of what purpose their marriage might serve and what roles each partner might fulfill—even as they both identified with the ideals of the New Negro and the goal of racial uplift. The ultimately tragic end to their union points to the difficulty of negotiating public expectations in private relationships.

In her recognition of marriage as both a public institution and a site of private desires, Curwood relates the complex history of those who aimed to find personal happiness while recognizing the broader political implications of their relationships. In addition to her contribution to understandings of New Negro unions of the interwar era, Curwood's attention to the often uneasy relationships between the personal and the political, the private and the public, and the projected ideal and the lived reality provides an important understanding of the many influences shaping intimate relationships and married life more broadly.

KAREN DUNAK
Muskingum University

REBECCA T. ALPERT. Out of Left Field: Jews and Black Baseball. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. ix, 236. $27.95.

Sports seem to tempt historians of other topics: after spending years writing about their so-called real subjects, some personal anecdote or manic fandom leads them to craft a history that uses sport as a window into something that they hope is of larger significance. For Rebecca T. Alpert, it was her mother's use of Jackie Robinson as a morality tale—which, she writes, "shaped my values as an American Jew" (p. 1)—that led her to write about the relationship between Jews and black baseball in the Jim Crow era. For the Brooklyn-born Alpert, Robinson, who lived in a Jewish neighborhood in Brooklyn, comes across as something of a Jewish folk hero. His wife, Rachel Robinson, learned to cook from neighbor Belle Malin, and close friends Sarah and Arch Satlow received a Christmas tree from the Robinsons who, knowing little about Jewish traditions, thought the couple did not have one because they could not afford it (p. 173).

Thus, Alpert quickly (and rightly) acknowledges in her introduction that Robinson's meaning in the Jewish imagination is far different from its acknowledged limitations in black reality. This book, then, is firmly rooted as a study of the connections among race, religion, and baseball in the first half of the twentieth century in the United States. Alpert's work includes substantial thought and research on the socio-economic roles of Jewish businessmen, activists, and an entire team of black Jews—the Belleville Grays—in the period of the Negro Leagues. Beyond the range of charming stories that she has unearthed, she offers excellent insights into how Jewish involvement in these leagues often perpetuated stereotypes, as Jewish owners and promoters, especially Ed Gottlieb, Syd Pollock, and Abe Saperstein (perhaps better known for founding the Harlem Globetrotters), were personified as the Shylocks of baseball, greedy and money-grubbing, as they executed their careful and successful business plans. However, she also contends that these figures applied Jewish beliefs of social equity to this arena, as well as capitalized on their financial resources in order to grow the black baseball industry within the national culture of oppressive segregation.

Alpert argues that Jews, while certainly whiter and more privileged than their African American counterparts in baseball, had a special understanding of discrimination that allowed them to play an instrumental role in both elevating the Negro Leagues and in helping desegregate the national pastime. Acknowledging that many criticized owners such as Pollock, who often emphasized black players' comedic and entertainment roles in various stereotypical—and racist—forms, she also highlights the role of Jewish sportswriters, particularly Nat Low, Bill Mardo, and Lester Rodney of the communist The Daily Worker, in the quest for desegregation, complicating the more familiar stories of Branch Rickey's "great experiment" and the work of black journalists such as Sam Lacy and Wendell Smith.

To her credit, Alpert understands the tensions embedded in this precarious situation. Just as Pollack, Gottlieb, and Saperstein endured antisemitic slurs, and were accused—often rightly, and by journalists such as Smith—of caring only about financial self-interest, they employed language such as shvartsers (a Yiddish racial slur) to describe their black partners and players, as well as played up the vaudeville/minstrel element to encourage attendance. Alpert's descriptions of Pollack's "clown" teams, especially, do little to further the argument that these business dealings were embedded with the Jewish quest for social justice that she describes.

Alongside Adrian Burgos, Jr.'s Playing America's Game: Baseball, Latinos, and the Color Line (2007), which offers a more persuasive and substantial view on the desegregation of baseball in the United States, Alpert makes a contribution here that shakes up the Robinson/Rickey mythologies but still falls short of her stated objective to "understand Jewish efforts at social justice in a business that was defined and constricted by the black-white racial divide" (p. 34). In the end, she is unable to substantiate how the three figures on whom she focuses—Pollack, Saperstein, Gottlieb—had the grand impact she seems to think they did, and the degree to which they consciously connected their business in the black leagues to their religious beliefs remains particularly murky. Perhaps most telling is the significance she attributes to her beloved Robinson cultivating a relationship with Hank Greenberg. Both players refer to their brief conversation during a game in 1947 in their respective autobiographies, and Wendell Smith wrote about it. But while Alpert acknowledges that "the reality was much more complex," she declares that "the memory of this one encounter between Robinson and Greenberg remained central to the myth of black-Jewish relationships as seen through the lens of baseball" (p. 171), a statement that brings her book back to its initial starting point—her mother's Robinson fable—and makes one wonder how significant any of this might actually be.

AMY BASS
College of New Rochelle

WILLIAM J. MELLO. New York Longshoremen: Class and Power on the Docks. Foreword by RICHARD GREENWALD and TIMOTHY J. MINCHIN. (Working in the Americas.) Gainesville: University Press of Florida. 2010. Pp. xiv, 241. $65.00.

Dock workers have historically played a strategic role in labor movements centered in major U.S. ports. William J. Mello correctly identifies the port of New York as the most significant of these from the 1930s through the 1960s. His aim is to highlight two key issues for longshoremen in this port during this era: the postwar political limits imposed on labor, both formal and informal, that held their movement back; and how the struggle for control on the job had broader meaning because employment was a "right of citizenship" and therefore inherently a political, not just economic, issue.

The book provides a useful but quite limited narrative of labor relations within the International Longshoremen's Association (ILA). It is not a trade union history in the organizational sense, but more a history of work and social movements within the ILA and on the docks. The book extends from the era of corrupt leadership under Joseph P. Ryan in the 1930s and 1940s through the business union style of Thomas "Teddy" Gleason in the 1960s. Corruption on the docks, including organized crime figures in local leadership like Albert Anastasia and his relatives, characterized the Ryan era. The violence against rank-and-file leaders and workers was resisted by an initial left-wing, Communist Party (CP) oriented movement that had a substantial following. Mello does not view the left-wing leadership as dominated by the Communist Party, however, but sees it as relatively independent. This is a view that many labor historians have put forward, but it would have been useful if Mello had cited other relevant secondary labor history sources to add weight to his argument.

In the postwar era this movement within the ILA collapsed with the rise of McCarthyism on the docks and the blacklisting of leftist activists. But the situation with the ILA differed dramatically from its union counterpart on the West Coast, the International Longshore and Warehouse Union (ILWU) centered in San Francisco under the leadership of Harry Bridges. McCarthyite attacks on the ILWU focused on Bridges's alleged Communist Party and CPUSA influence within the ILA. The ILA, however, was targeted because of the tactical alliance between leftwing activists on the New York docks and rightwing local leadership that was connected to corrupt activities but at war with the ILA's top leaders, particularly Ryan. The left in the ILA, without real power at the top of the union, became a far easier target, with job exclusion of suspected communists reinforced by a shift toward registration for hiring purposes in line with Taft-Hartley anticommunist provisions. On the West Coast, the ILWU had driven out the ILA in the 1930s, and with it corrupt, gangster-linked leaders connected to Ryan's East Coast operation. The ILWU had no need for such tactical alliances in Pacific ports, while the Left had a strong position in union leadership. The ILWU maintained control over hiring on Pacific Coast docks, while on the East Coast the ILA lost its influence over hiring through the new government-run Waterfront Commission.

The ILA's reputation for corruption and gangster violence has been a theme in American popular culture (in movies such as On the Waterfront [1954]). However, Mello seeks to go beyond this stereotype by focusing as much on the intrusion of anti-union political forces in government who were supported by the employers as on the ILA leadership's criminal side. The use of government injunctions preventing strikes created an unlikely alliance of left-wing rank-and-file leaders and emerging anticommunist rank-and-file leaders that had some organized crime connections. This realist strategy is reminiscent of later reform movements in the 1970s and 1980s, such as in the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, that played corrupt leaders against each other.

The book presents a detailed narrative on contract negotiations, the use of injunctions when negotiations broke down, and the resulting strikes and work stoppages. Much of the fight on the union side involved the development of rank-and-file movements as an alternative to ILA officers who were viewed as compromising or selling out workers' interests. Leadership challenges form a major part of the book.

Wage rise disputes were always major issues, but Mello highlights the growing importance of job control in an industry where the shape up (temporary hiring of work gangs) was being transformed into a more permanent hiring system under government regulation and the control of the Bi-State Waterfront Commission. The Waterfront Commission sought to eliminate criminal infiltration of the ILA, but it also weakened workers' influence on waterfront jobs. This helped forge a level of unity within the ILA, as the Waterfront Commission was viewed as aiding New York Port employers and politicians who wanted a more malleable union. Job control included the issue of job preservation, which gave rise to the Guaranteed Annual Income (GAI) on the East Coast docks.

By the 1950s, the high level of strikes on the New York Port docks, which had spread to many East Coast and southern ports organized by the ILA, led the federal government under Presidents Dwight D. Eisenhower, John F. Kennedy, and finally Lyndon B. Johnson to initiate injunctions under the Taft-Hartley Act and to view these strikes as a danger to "the health and safety of the nation." Union locals and rank-and-file ILA members resisted the ILA leaderships' moves to trade the GAI and higher wages for fewer men on work gangs and a consequent steep decline in jobs.

The book does not mention Colin J. Davis's significant study Waterfront Revolts: New York and London Dockworkers, 1946–61 (2003). While Davis provides substantial material on African American dockworkers in New York, Mello hardly mentions them. Mello also appears to have done no archival research for his book, although there is a list of published government reports. Several interviews were conducted but these are not listed in the bibliography, only in the notes. Most of the primary source evidence comes from the New York Times and from rank-and-file ILA newspapers.

This book is a useful reference on key issues in industrial relations on the New York Port docks, as well as details from ILA local leadership battles, contract negotiations, and work stoppages when negotiations broke down. To go further, however, would have required far more substantial primary source research on this very important part of U.S. labor history.

DAVID PALMER
Flinders University

ALEXANDER J. FIELD. A Great Leap Forward: 1930s Depression and U.S. Economic Growth. (Yale Series in Economic and Financial History.) New Haven: Yale University Press. 2011. Pp. ix, 387. $45.00.

Modern economic history, with its emphasis on rigorous quantitative methods, has moved almost entirely out of history departments into economics departments. The primary challenge for the cliometrician writing a book is to set aside the scientific prose and methodological focus that characterize the Journal of Economic History and to craft instead a compelling narrative or at least an arresting analysis. In this book, beginning with its provocatively Maoist title, Alexander J. Field offers the latter. He argues that the Great Depression years of the 1930s—not the war years of the 1940s—provided the necessary foundation for the post-war boom. Furthermore, he contends that the apparently stagnant years of the Depression were the "most technologically progressive decade of the century" (p. 15).

Field's argument rests on measuring total factor productivity (TFP). When economic outputs and inputs are accounted for, and inputs remain unchanged but output goes up, the increase can be attributed to TFP because of innovation and technological improvement. Field explains that from 1929 to 1941, total hours worked in the U.S. private non-farm economy stayed basically the same. Although capital input had declined, output was from thirty-three to forty percent higher. Field identifies this change as an indication of improvement in TFP. Field writes, "this empirical observation is one of the key findings of the book" (p. 7).

Field goes on to explain that it was activity during the Depression, not World War II, that caused major productivity gains. The war saw as many spillovers from civilian to military expertise as the other way around; moreover, the shift of workers and equipment into military production retarded growth in overall productivity. By contrast, microeconomic evidence suggests that the 1930s were characterized by considerable innovation and investment. During the fallow years of the Depression, firms plowed money into research and development, doubling such expenditures. Reaping benefits from the transition to electrification, advances in chemistry, new factory layouts, and the use of conveyer belts, U.S. factories became more productive. Communications and transportation infrastructure grew, with special emphasis on roads, tunnels, bridges, and other accommodations for automotive traffic. Street and highway capital in the United States increased by two-thirds between 1929 and 1948; almost all of the increase came before the war. Field notes that "by 1941 . . . the network of national routes that remains with us to this day, although subsequently expanded and paralleled by the interstate system, was essentially complete" (p. 78). Road-building during the Depression (much of it by the Works Progress Administration) made possible the postwar boom in suburbanization as automotive travel and trucking expanded.

World War II, if anything, disrupted the pattern of expansion in place during the preceding decade; "progression toward full employment" was well under way by 1941, and "without the disruptions of the war" the levels of productivity reached in 1948 might have been reached in 1942 (p. 99). For a quarter-century after the war—"the golden age"—the U.S. economy reaped the benefits of increased productivity, including its new transportation network. The practices of "piggy-backing"—putting the cargo portion of a tractor-trailer on a rail car—and containerization linked road and rail networks. Integrated transport networks knit the nation together and made the economy more efficient overall. This golden age concluded by 1973. Field cautiously writes that, while many factors may have played a role, the end of the era of growth "coincides with a tapering off of gains from a one-time reconfiguration of the surface freight system in the United States" (p. 115).

Field's analysis of the Depression accords with the view that massive shocks to demand, originating in the financial sector, created the crisis. Discussing in passing the contrary notion that Herbert Hoover's efforts to prop up wages and Franklin D. Roosevelt's efforts to do likewise, as well as encourage unionization, were what made the Depression unendurable, Field remarks, "high rates of unionization and strong real wage growth coexisted with employment growth and a decent capacity utilization during the golden age" (p. 323, n. 23).

Considering our current plight in light of the 1930s, Field writes that the financial crises of the two eras have some similarities, both owing to the underregulation of banks and bank-like firms: "a failure to control, or really to be interested in controlling, the growth of leverage" (p. 257). He argues that financial reform in the 1930s "laid the groundwork for the resumption of a relatively smooth process of physical capital accumulation," and that if we wish to come out of the current unpleasantness on a similarly sure footing, it will require a similarly adequate regulatory response (p. 276).

ERIC RAUCHWAY
University of California,
Davis

JAMES T. SPARROW. Warfare State: World War II Americans and the Age of Big Government. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. 336. $34.95.

Scholars have often complained that American historiography has been narrowly defined by three topics: the American Revolution, the Civil War, and World War II. The last has captured modern attention, perceived as the "good war" and attended by the emergence of the United States as a world power and the roots of the subsequent "Cold War." After an initial flood of reminiscences, official histories, and biographies through the 1970s, a period of revisionism occurred as part of the Vietnam "culture wars." More recently has come a mature and almost celebratory historical reconsideration of the "Greatest Generation." While there has been continuous and healthy attention to the "home front" during the 1941–1945 period, increasingly the theoretical focus has derived from the social sciences.

The forces and events of World War II that bore on different groups of Americans have received the attention of specialists and advocates for those groups: African Americans, women, labor, farmers, immigrants, and the poor. Their research has its origins in the official histories sponsored by the armed services at the behest of President Franklin D. Roosevelt. As additional documentary materials have become available and the analytical methodologies of the social sciences have developed, significant revisions have been made to the official histories of different ethnic and class groups. There has been an effort to generalize the disparate experiences of World War II through an analysis of the state, perceptions of the state by American citizens, and how the war changed citizen and state relationships. James T. Sparrow's new study operates in this arena.

Sparrow's work is informed by the writings of Jürgen Habermas and Michel Foucault on the formation of the state and the concept of the public sphere. He argues that the war provided an opportunity for the Roosevelt administration to overcome "the traditions of individualism and decentralized government that had conspired to thwart a centralized national state" (p. 8). The transition of the government from the New Deal to the war offered a transformative opportunity. From this Roosevelt's "task then was to obscure the statist foundations of public power while insinuating them into the thoughts and lives of the citizenry" (p. 49). While previous wartime expansions of government, in 1861–1865 and 1917–1919, had been temporary, this expansion was to be permanent. The mobilization and indoctrination of sixteen million servicemen and women and of home front war production workers assured the government's ability to condition the American people to a larger public sphere and state. While there certainly may have been New Dealers in the administration who indulged this perspective, it is doubtful that it, rather than winning the war and building a stable postwar peace, was Roosevelt's objective.

This book is a new rendering of Sparrow's doctoral dissertation and retains some of the characteristics of the latter. It has been enhanced with well-chosen photographs to emphasize specific conclusions. There are 839 dense end notes for the 260 pages of narrative. Some of the writing is mildly orotund, with some sentences running over sixty words. The source materials include a series of "morale" surveys conducted by the Office of War Information, including interpretations of volunteer "Morale Wardens." Sparrow also uses other sources of the "thoughts" of soldiers, workers, and other Americans garnered by similar means. Whether these can be viewed as definitive of any political formulation is doubtful. Of the officers of the Roosevelt administration, Sparrow relies heavily on Henry Morgenthau at the Treasury Department and Harold Ickes at the Department of the Interior; neither seems to be particularly reliable on the subject of the president's wartime policies.

By the end of the war the American people—and more importantly, the electorate—had been converted to supporters of the new enlarged and dominant central government. Wartime tax exactions accustomed Americans to a large-scale government budget and to government presence through an expanding array of expectations and entitlements. While there was a brief return to a smaller federal government in 1946–1949, Korea and the Cold War revived the wartime “public sphere”—one that persisted through American involvement in Vietnam and the rise of Ronald Reagan.

Sparrow provides us with new insight into the revisionist history of World War II. He is perceptive in emphasizing the active role of President Roosevelt in setting policy and pursuing it through public pronouncements, fiscal policy, and publicity. At the same moment, the book seems a bit uncertain in the larger context of the diplomatic, industrial, and military efforts of the war. The notion that the government intended to use the war to build a new state also seems problematic. Certainly, as Alan Brinkley emphasized, it was the end of New Deal reform.

MICHAEL G. CAREW
Baruch College

MELISSA A. MCEUEN. Making War, Making Women: Femininity and Duty on the American Home Front, 1941–1945. Athens: University of Georgia Press. 2011. Pp. xiv, 270. Cloth $69.95, paper $24.95.

During the past decade, popular histories such as Emily Yellin's accessible Our Mothers' War: American Women at Home and at the Front during World War II (2004) have contributed to broad understandings of American women's varied experiences of wartime mobilization. Public fascination with the rapid changes and continuities in American life immediately preceding, during, and following World War II remains palpable in commemorations such as the recent observation of the seventieth anniversary of the Japanese bombing of Pearl Harbor and the U.S. declaration of war. Into this familiar landscape of remembrance arrives Melissa A. McEuen's new monograph.

McEuen's cultural history draws heavily on wartime propaganda posters, publicity photographs, and mass-circulated advertisements. It builds on the insights of an earlier generation of scholars—among them Robert Westbrook and Leila J. Rupp—to establish the centrality of gendered and racial constructs of what many Americans apparently were fighting for in the 1940s: a homogenizing amalgam of what McEuen refers to as “cheesecake” values. Throughout the war, she argues,

“If keeping morale high seemed the ultimate priority on the American home front, then women's bodies would be put into service of the goal. And women everywhere would confront messages exhorting them to expend personal energy on their physical appearance for the nation's sake and their own” (p. 57).

Her study of prescriptive literature arising out of wartime crisis and mobilization—largely through analysis of the U.S. Office of War Information's exhortations and consumer ads in publications such as LIFE and Ladies' Home Journal—is literally and figuratively focused on women's physical attributes. She offers a feminist framework for exploring why many wartime women, especially those in their twenties and thirties, responded enthusiastically to prescriptive advice to create bodies that conformed to Hollywood ideals: “[T]hey needed to make themselves into something worth fighting for. If they did, their efforts would be noticed, therefore qualifying them as good citizens and team players” (p. 2). Here is a history of cultural possibilities, limitations, and artifice, which did not yield uniform responses from American women but nevertheless exerted powerful influences on the style and substance of their wartime lives.

The book is full of fascinating images, and the author's background as an historian of photography strengthens the work. Her eye for detail is apparent in discussions, for example, of Betty Grable, whose famed pin-up was just one suggestive element of the place of women's bodies in a militarizing nation. McEuen shows how U.S. Army instructors superimposed a grid over an image of the actress “to teach American soldiers map-reading . . . perhaps the most literal example of the official use of a woman's points, lines, and surfaces” (p. 134). Images with erotic appeal juxtaposed uneasily with wholesome girl-next-door portrayals in mass-produced photographs, illustrations, and advertisements that carried idealized messages to a mobile citizenry both at home and abroad.

As scholarship built primarily on sources produced in wartime, this book could have been strengthened with greater attention to chronology and narrative. The work is organized topically, with chapters devoted to women's cosmetics, the fetishization of female hands and legs, and wartime emphases on hygiene and clothing. But because of the book's organizational scheme, interpretive discussions of, for example, minority women's experiences with workplace discrimination are buried in lengthy considerations of personal appearance and consumerism. Fortunately, a more narrative arc appears near the end of the book, with a concluding chapter and epilogue that depart from the work's overall focus on physicality. These final pages probe the ways in which American wartime and immediate postwar culture prescribed altered sets of expectations for women's intellect and emotions, while carrying over themes of sacrifice and “agreeability.” Attention to these themes permits the author to conclude the book with some of its most provocative images, including analyses of 1940s-era American women as mothers and workers, lovers and revelers.

One of the questions that the author raises—but does not satisfactorily answer—is how feminist historians might respond to the present-day ubiquity of the term “the Greatest Generation.” McEuen seems to favor a broad-swath approach, suggesting, for example, that all American women of the 1940s participated in “the Greatest Generation.” But as the varied images in this work attest, some women, and some images of womanhood, were much more visible than others. Not everyone embraced dominant wartime cultural values of nationalism and patriotism. Thus for interpreters of that fascinating and complicated era, a challenging task remains: to read and understand documentary evidence that exists in places less prominent than those of the most highly touted visual images.

RACHEL WALTNER GOOSSEN
Washburn University

KENNETH OSGOOD and ANDREW K. FRANK, editors. Selling War in a Media Age: The Presidency and Public Opinion in the American Century. Afterword by DAVID HALBERSTAM. (The Alan B. Larkin Series on the American Presidency.) Gainesville: University Press of Florida. 2010. Pp. xii, 278. $44.95.

The book under review is a useful and timely volume that developed from the 2007 Alan B. Larkin Symposium on the American Presidency. The editors, Kenneth Osgood and Andrew K. Frank, present eleven meaty essays by an all-star cast of authors that includes seven former presidents of the Society for Historians of American Foreign Relations and final remarks by David Halberstam, who died soon after the symposium. Osgood and Frank should be commended for offering readers both a solid introduction and conclusion, which, to some degree, make up for the lack of an index and bibliography.

Spanning the period from the presidency of William McKinley to that of George W. Bush, only a few of the essays are based on archival research. But considering their originality and intellectual breadth, this does not represent a shortcoming. Andrew L. Johns sets the stage admirably, discussing how the concept of the “salesman in chief” (p. 1) developed in the period before McKinley and the problems of dealing with multiple audiences at home and abroad, and he worries about the lack of truthfulness in some presidents’ mas-saging of the facts.

The modern era began with McKinley, the first president who made managing the press a central feature in launching a war and battling for Americans’ hearts and minds. George C. Herring, while admiring McKinley’s skill, is distressed because “he established unfortunate precedents that would be employed time and again by his successors to defend dubious ventures” (p. 44). Woodrow Wilson certainly followed those precedents during World War I, armed with technological innovations such as motion pictures. In her essay, Emily S. Rosenberg explores his administration’s attempts at mass persuasion, censorship, and curbing dissent in a new “public relations state” (p. 63).

A generation later, Franklin D. Roosevelt availed himself of an even wider variety of innovations, including radio and “talkies,” first to move Americans toward intervention and then to support his strategies for the prosecution of World War II and the peace to follow. Mark A. Stoler explains how domestic politics influenced the way the president approached his public relations problems, sometimes compelling him to employ “duplicity” (p. 87) in his direction of the propaganda campaigns at home. Here the author reinforces the powerful argument made by Eric Alterman in When Presidents Lie: A History of Official Deception and Its Consequences (2004), which condemns such duplicity because of the impact it had on Americans’ understanding of international realities during the Cold War.

Robert D. Schulzinger complements this argument with his analysis of themes in major presidential speeches on the Cold War from 1947 to 1969. Here we see some development over time from hard-line depictions of the “enemy” to more nuanced approaches that held out the hope for accommodation. These new approaches were responses, in part, to the fact that the simple good and evil images no longer impressed Americans fearful about nuclear war.

Marilyn B. Young sees the consensus breaking down even earlier in her essay on the Korean War entitled “Hard Sell.” For a variety of reasons, many Americans, including those fighting the war, could not be convinced that they needed to stay in Korea after it became clear that the military forces were deadlocked. But because those who opposed the war were not organized, little was learned by the time the United States intervened in another Asian civil war.

Writing about the war in Vietnam, Chester Pach concentrates on President Lyndon Johnson’s failed 1967 Progress Campaign to respond to growing television news criticism. He lost that “living room war” (p. 191) because there was no way he could contend with the ample evidence that there was no light at the end of the tunnel in that costly conflict. David Halberstam’s “Worm’s-Eye View” that concludes the volume is a compelling personal account of another side of Johnson’s selling job, the attempt to silence honest journalists who were just reporting what they saw in Vietnam.

It would have been helpful to have a piece on Nixon, the media, and Vietnam. Instead the scene shifts to Ronald Reagan and the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI), a public relations battle won by the Great Communicator. Paul S. Boyer demonstrates how Reagan sold his SDI and beat the Nuclear Freeze movement at its own game by convincing Americans that his was the road to peace.

In the last substantive chapter, Lloyd Gardner presents a searing critique of George W. Bush’s campaign to sell the second Gulf War, employing a public relations firm to help his new Office of Strategic Information combat the “reality based community” (p. 238). His successful but deceitful approach to rallying citizens, among many others, is what concerns Robert J. McMahon in his conclusion. As he looks over the previous essays, he wonders whether it is possible for American presidents to be honest with the American people in a democratic system in which politics never has stopped at the water's edge.

MELVIN SMALL,
Emeritus
Wayne State University

RONALD H. LIMBAUGH. Tungsten in Peace and War, 1918–1946. Reno: University of Nevada Press. 2010. Pp. xiv, 284. $44.95.

Global mineral supplies are back in the news as Chinese demand for everything from rare earths for cell phones to copper for electrification consumes more world supplies. In 2005, the Chinese government cut international exports of tungsten in order to feed growing domestic demand for the heavy metal. Chinese steel makers celebrated, but American tungsten consumers faced shortages and high prices.

As Ronald H. Limbaugh reminds us in this insightful book, Americans have long struggled with how best to guarantee access to the minerals critical for modern technological society. Limbaugh also provides a valuable historical analysis of the broader issue of American mineral resource supplies between the two world wars.

Tungsten is classed among the “heavy metals,” a term that today often inspires fears of poisoned groundwater and cancer clusters. However, for most of its relatively short history as an essential commodity, tungsten was renowned for its ability to make hard steel even harder. Tungsten has the highest melting point of any of the metallic elements, making it an ideal alloy for machine tool bits used to cut other metals. At the Paris Exposition of 1900, the American efficiency expert Frederick W. Taylor famously demonstrated the power of a steel machine tool bit alloyed with tungsten to cut softer steels at white-hot speed.

This so-called “high-speed steel” became an essential material for new military and aerospace technologies. During World War I, tungsten steel was used in heavy artillery barrels and shells, as well as in the tough armor plate needed to resist them. On a less bellicose front, after 1909 the General Electric Company replaced Thomas Edison's old carbon-alloy light bulb filament with a tungsten version that generated more light and less heat.

As tungsten increasingly came to be seen as a vital natural resource, Americans noted that the global geological lottery had not endowed all nations equally. Pure tungsten is never found in nature; indeed, the alacrity with which the metal bonds with other elements is partly why it works so well as an alloy. The most common tungsten minerals are wolframite and scheelite, large deposits of which are found in China, Russia, Kazakhstan, and Canada. The United States' own holdings are sizeable if not abundant, primarily confined to a handful of deposits in Nevada, California, Montana, and Colorado.

The question of global tungsten distribution and trade is a key focus of Limbaugh's book. First during World War I, and with even greater urgency in World War II, Americans debated how best to insure a steady supply of tungsten for war and peace. Should the government take steps to spur domestic production, or was the key to seek reliable international supplies for import? Complex political, economic, and technological factors nearly guaranteed that no easy answer would emerge.

To gain detailed insights into the domestic industry, Limbaugh focuses on the history of the Nevada-Massachusetts Company, one of the largest tungsten mining operations in the nation. Under the skillful guidance of Charles H. Segerstrom, a California banker who early on recognized tungsten's potential, the Nevada-Massachusetts survived for nearly half a century. In the process, Segerstrom became as skilled at dealing with politicians in Washington, D.C., as he was in competing with his fellow tungsten producers, and he emerged as one of the leading spokesmen for the industry.

Segerstrom and his colleagues never forgot how World War I briefly pushed tungsten prices to record highs that subsequently collapsed when the war ended, devastating many of the smaller new tungsten producers in the process. The Americans blamed Chinese producers who flooded the market with cheap wolframite concentrates that sold at a third of the domestic price. Segerstrom and others urged Congress to adopt protective tariffs to nurture a domestic industry. In the long run, they argued, domestic mines could supply future American needs and would be less vulnerable to interruption by wars or the decisions of capricious foreign governments.

While this predominately Republican protectionist argument had some merit, Limbaugh rightly notes that it also “embodied the xenophobic nationalism” of the time and was “at times more emotional than rational” (p. 47). The progressive and mostly Democratic internationalists countered that the call for tariffs was self-serving and hypocritical. Restrictions on trade would lead to higher prices for domestic users of tungsten and possibly spark destructive trade wars. Internationalists argued that American access to tungsten and other critical minerals was best guaranteed by free trade. It did not matter whether tungsten came from China or Nevada, as long as supplies were adequate to keep the nation's economy and military strong.

While protectionists had some success in the interwar period, in the long run New Deal internationalists predominated. With the renewed shortages of World War II, the Roosevelt administration adopted a two-pronged approach of seeking international supplies while also providing generous support for domestic producers. By the war's end, earlier tungsten shortages had turned into embarrassing surpluses.

In a brief epilogue, Limbaugh notes that while the emotional appeal of the “buy American” argument continues to this day, the decline of domestic mining has made the internationalist approach the default victor. However, when new calls for protectionist measures emerge again for various metals, as they surely will, Limbaugh's fine history of tungsten should be required reading for all involved.

TIMOTHY JAMES LECAIN
Montana State University

SHANE J. MADDOCK. Nuclear Apartheid: The Quest for American Atomic Supremacy from World War II to the Present. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 2010. Pp. xvi, 392. $35.00.

The literature on nuclear disarmament and arms control is dominated more by scholars of international relations, political science, and peace studies than by historians. When historians have discussed arms control policies they have usually done so in the context of the study of the broader foreign policy of a certain administration or administrations. The list of books dealing with the history of American (or other nations') disarmament and arms control policies is not impressive, and for that reason the publication of Shane J. Maddock's book seemed to be a welcome event. In a way it is, but there is also something disappointing about it.

The book's subject is the history of nuclear non-dissemination and the resultant Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty (NPT) of 1968. This could be a very important book, if only because it is the first of its kind. Unfortunately, the author allows his strong revisionist approach to the study of U.S. foreign policy to carry him too far. Maddock tells of the attempts by American administrations—ranging from that of Franklin D. Roosevelt to that of Richard Nixon—to curb and then limit the spread of nuclear knowledge and weapons. However, what historians and scholars of arms control would interpret as a wish to reduce the risk of nuclear catastrophe that might result from the unrestricted spread of nuclear weapons, Maddock interprets in the context of decolonization. Maddock views the American policy of nuclear non-dissemination as an act of discrimination and deprivation directed against weaker states, thus subjecting them to nuclear apartheid.

Maddock distinguishes between "three types of nuclear states": the five recognized nuclear states, the member states of NATO and the Warsaw Pact who had access to, but did not possess, nuclear weapons, "and a large class of non-nuclear states who renounced their right to go nuclear" (p. x). The last type is the one subjected to apartheid and colonization. So who were the states subjected to the kind of regime once experienced by black South Africans? Among others we can find Japan, Switzerland, Sweden, Mexico, Brazil, and Argentina. Furthermore, the United States did the best it could to prevent France and even Britain from going nuclear. Decolonization? Even the argument that NATO was actually a framework for having nuclear weapons by proxy ("nuclear sharing") is dubious. One can easily argue that, on the contrary, Washington's promise to provide a nuclear umbrella to its allies was a subtle way of preventing them from developing their own nuclear weapons, while leaving the actual decision to use nuclear weapons solely in American hands.

The term "nuclear apartheid" was coined by an Indian diplomat (p. 1), a statement coloring the whole issue with strong political overtones. Obviously, the Indian diplomat used the phrase in order to justify his government's decision to go nuclear despite the NPT, justifying the move as a measure of decolonization. Did that make the United States colonialist? Only in the same way that depriving Britain in the late 1940s and early 1950s from getting information that could allow them to develop their own nuclear project makes the United States colonialist.

Why is it so important to dismiss the book's reference to apartheid and decolonization? First, because as an interpretive tool it is problematic for the reasons mentioned above. Second, because in relation to the history of nuclear nonproliferation the reference only obscures the real meaning of both the term "apartheid" and the historical process that resulted in the Non-proliferation Treaty.

The book does reflect the attempts made by consecutive American administrations to maintain American nuclear hegemony and later dominance. One can certainly question the motives of American presidents in making the decisions they did, and when read from this perspective, as a revisionist history of American nuclear non-proliferation, the book provides a meaningful contribution to the study of American foreign policy. The problem is that Maddock carries his revisionism a bit too far, and his dedication to the idea of nuclear apartheid brings him to misinterpret moves and actions. One example is his attack of FDR and Harry Truman for assuming that nuclear secrets could be contained for a long time. Maddock argues that the two presidents wasted "opportunities to conclude a nonproliferation agreement at a time when enforcement would have been less complicated and before the growth [of the] Cold War rivalry between Washington and Moscow made such a treaty much more difficult to negotiate" (p. 12). First, negotiating a nonproliferation treaty during World War II seems a utopian endeavor by any criteria. Second, the real obstacle to the signing of the NPT during the Cold War was not the state of American-Soviet relations; it was alliance politics, in both camps, that significantly slowed down the progress toward the treaty.

Another example is that Maddock sees no role for Harold Stassen within the Eisenhower administration. However, the documents deposited in Eisenhower's presidential library and in U.S. national archives tell us that Stassen, almost single-handedly with the support of Dwight D. Eisenhower, brought change to American nuclear policy and made progress on arms control possible.

Still, this is an important book because parts of the above-mentioned arguments fall into the category of historians' debates. And it is so also because the book forces the reader to rethink some of the issues discussed, and, if used carefully, it is a valuable source on the study of American non-proliferation policy.

Lastly, it is unclear whose choice it was, but the book's notes and citations are rather sparse. Long discussions go on without placing a citation that would allow the reader to track the sources of the author's arguments. Notes are an integral part of good research, and it is a pity that they are often missing where they are needed most.

DAVID TAL
University of Calgary

NAOKO WAKE. Private Practices: Harry Stack Sullivan, the Science of Homosexuality, and American Liberalism. New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 263. $55.00.

The current debate over civil rights for gays, lesbians, and transgendered individuals demonstrates how far we have come as a nation. Sexual issues once considered too provocative for open discourse are now discussed routinely on news programs and in our legislative bodies. "Homosexuality in the twenty-first-century United States is highly politicized," writes historian Naoko Wake. "No matter what stance we take, the issue is something that must be openly confronted and that must be checked against our belief in justice, fairness, and equality" (p. 1). In this sense, while same-sex desires and sexual acts, as well as gender performances and identities that deviate from cookie-cutter expressions of heteronormativity, are far from celebrated in contemporary American society, homosexuality is no longer the unspeakable. This, of course, was not always the case, and the professional and personal choices that contributed to the silencing of sexual nonconformity in the early to mid-twentieth century are the subject of Wake's volume.

In the 1920s and 1930s, the anxieties and pleasures of modernity, in tandem with the intellectual excitement generated by the emerging theory of cultural relativism, encouraged some scientists to pursue the study of sexuality. Many of these scientists, including biologists, psychiatrists, and anthropologists, embraced a far wider array of sexual desires and practices as "normal" than did larger society. They argued that institutionalized homophobia contributed to various neuroses and sociopathic behaviors in individuals, especially men, who might otherwise have been fully functioning citizens. The catch was that these scientists were stuck in a multidimensional closet. They could neither openly articulate their beliefs about homophobia nor claim their own subjectivities as gay men and lesbians. The result was that by the 1940s, privately "liberal" scientists had lost control of the issue, and homosexuality became labeled a mental illness with disastrous results for countless Americans ever since.

One of these scientists was psychiatrist Harry Stack Sullivan. Wake's six chapters trace the emergence of Sullivan's personal and professional views regarding homosexuality, the standard treatment for schizophrenia and homosexuality at Sheppard and Enoch Pratt Hospital where Sullivan began his career, his reasons for leaving to establish a private practice, his tenure as the director of the Selective Service during World War II, and his postwar involvement in international mental health policy. Throughout this analysis is an ongoing discussion of the tensions between Sullivan's personal beliefs as a gay man and his professional assertions regarding homosexuality. Wake reveals an important shift in the nation's intellectual climate between the 1920s and the late 1940s and places Sullivan at the center of it. Whereas scientists in the earlier period celebrated differences of opinion as well as differences in sexual practices, by the outbreak of World War II, there was no longer room for ambiguity in either. Sullivan found himself administering the same homophobic policies that he had long blamed for causing mental illness. By the time Sullivan died in 1949, "He was a homosexual man rejecting homosexuality," with dire consequences for himself, the scientific study of sexuality, and gays, lesbians, and transgendered individuals across the globe (p. 168).

There are two points of concern with Wake's analysis. First, Wake is a careful writer, selective in her words and terminology. However, her use of "liberalism" lacks this precision. She uses "liberalism" to indicate the acceptance of homosexuals and other marginalized groups as worthy of inclusion in the national body. "Conservatism" is the opposite of this. But these are loaded terms. Wake's failure to consistently connect them to broader political events (she writes about "liberalism" in the 1930s without any mention of the New Deal, for example) is frustrating to say the least. Second, Wake hesitates to pass judgment on Sullivan's insistence that his and his attendants' sexual intimacy with patients as part of their treatment had therapeutic value. While Wake acknowledges that these practices did raise eyebrows, not until the penultimate page does she explicitly state that these practices were "exploitation" (p. 217), not merely problematic. Wake's insistence on a cool objectivity in a book about the dangers of such an approach is baffling. Perhaps a discussion of the era's medical ethics regarding doctor-patient relationships would have been useful in this regard.

These critiques are not meant to detract from the larger significance of this volume. Wake is a meticulous researcher, and her analysis of patient records, especially the transcriptions of interviews, is careful, nuanced, and intelligent. This book makes important contributions to our understanding of the history of science, particularly the field of psychiatry, the intellectual histories of homophobia and racism, and the emergence of sexual citizenship in the mid-twentieth century. It is a must-read for scholars interested in any of these topics.

CAROLYN HERBST LEWIS
Louisiana State University

MARTIN WOESSNER. Heidegger in America. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. xiv, 294. $90.00.

Much ink has been devoted to the life and thought of Martin Heidegger; there was probably no more infamous and controversial philosopher in the twentieth century. Arising as a notable critic of neo-Kantianism, Heidegger pioneered a brand of phenomenology that challenged Kant's Copernican revolution and simultaneously captured the sense of crisis that was widespread in Weimar Germany. What circumstances made Heidegger's transatlantic migration to the United States possible? This is one of the central questions that Martin Woessner addresses in his magnificent book.

Richard Wolin wrote a trenchant study of Heidegger's students, but Woessner has taken significant steps further by focusing on indirect recipients of Heidegger's thought. The result is a fascinating work of transatlantic intellectual and cultural history that is sure to prompt intellectual historians to take the phenomenon of intellectual and cultural reception more seriously.

Woessner's book has two explicit goals. First, "it attempts to narrate the genesis, the rise, and in some cases at least, the eventual fall of certain ideas in certain historical contexts—in this case, the philosophical writings of Martin Heidegger as they were encountered by readers and thinkers in the United States." Second, the book provides "a case study in the application of reception studies to the history of ideas" (p. 5). In pursuit of both goals, Woessner provides his own readings of Heidegger's thought, demonstrating that Heidegger embodied many different things to many different people. Although Woessner playfully proposes that Heidegger can serve as a kind of blank page on which the intellectual historian of reception can read the history of postwar America, his methods do not result in a postmodern "death of the author." Instead, Woessner draws on the intellectual legacy of Pierre Bourdieu to identify specific networks of recipients who packaged and repackaged ideas to suit epistemological, political, aesthetic, and financial ambitions of their own. Among the numerous Heideggers constructed and reconstructed by his readers, Woessner presents a history of the U.S. audiences who fashioned Heidegger as, "among other things, an ontologist, an existentialist, an anti-humanist, a proto-postmodernist, a phenomenologist, a theologian, a reclusive sage, and even a cultural critic" (p. 7).

Woessner begins with an examination of Heidegger's first American interlocutors: his first American students (i.e., Charles Hartshorne, Paul Weiss, Sidney Hook, and Marjorie Grene), as well as former German students who became exiles in America during the 1930s and 1940s (i.e., Hannah Arendt, Herbert Marcuse, Günther Anders, Paul Oskar Kristeller, Hans Loewald, Karl Löwith, and Leo Strauss). Both groups had complicated relationships with Heidegger. None functioned as disciples. Instead, they all found things to be admired and discarded in his philosophy. None dedicated themselves to commentaries or exegeses on Heideggerian philosophy, but they fruitfully borrowed concepts and methodologies that they then transmitted to Americans in ways that made the influence of Heidegger hard to detect—a trend that the reader sees repeated by other Americans in nearly every subsequent chapter.

The next series of chapters proceed beyond classroom and student/teacher relationships to situate receptions of Heidegger in a variety of postwar American settings. Although Heidegger abandoned organized religion at a young age, for example, his work took shape against the background of crisis theology. Thus, his first American academic audience was composed of theologians animated by a desire to come to grips with the lessons of World War II. Similar issues involving modern nihilism and the sense of technocratic homelessness inspired both those who marketed Heidegger as an intellectual commodity (i.e., J. Glenn Gray, the general editor for his English translated works), as well as those who consumed the commodity (general readers of existentialism, as well as architectural critics of modernism and proponents of architectural postmodernism). For philosophers, the engagement may have been more technical, but the results could be equally idiosyncratic and creative. Both his analytic detractors and his continental supporters constructed competing caricatures of Heidegger in efforts to conduct larger debates regarding the proper relationships among science, metaphysics, and philosophy. With so many competing versions of Heidegger and Heideggerian philosophy, it is little wonder that numerous participants in the cultural wars of the 1980s and 1990s paradoxically were able to see his legacy as both a cause and an antidote for modern nihilism.

A gifted stylist, and talented historian, Woessner has produced a major study of Heidegger's reception in the United States. In addition to being of interest to intellectual and cultural historians, the book is sure to be of interest to scholars in the numerous academic disciplines that constitute Woessner's reception history.

THOMAS WHEATLAND
Assumption College

GRACE ELIZABETH HALE. A Nation of Outsiders: How the White Middle Class Fell in Love with Rebellion in Postwar America. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 386. $29.95.

Grace Elizabeth Hale's recent book does a masterful job tying together disparate strands of postwar U.S. history to demonstrate both how the white middle class fell in love with rebellion and the consequences of that love. Combining deep and thorough research with close readings of influential cultural artifacts from Elvis Presley's televised performances and Jack Kerouac's On the Road (1957) to Tom Hayden's Student Social Action (1962) and Jerry Falwell's autobiography, Hale builds her account on the recent profusion of historical scholarship on both left and right politics in the United States. Her most valuable contribution is to combine cultural, social, and political historical narratives across genres and political divides.

Beginning with J. D. Salinger's new model for white adolescent identity in The Catcher in the Rye (1951)—an identity combining the alienated individual with the outsider community—Hale traces the evolution of a generational (and racialized and gendered) sense of alienation from and rebellion against mass culture that quickly became the mainstream culture. The new outsider had deep roots in Romantic and bohemian subcultures, but only in the postwar era did it form the basis for a nearly universal adolescent identity with the idea of self-expression at its core.

Rock 'n' roll provided the perfect vehicle for the expression of estrangement from parental culture. Hale emphasizes the historical impact of blackface minstrelsy in providing the model for white, middle-class kids' interaction with rock 'n' roll. Nicely synthesizing scholarly interpretations of minstrelsy and the blues, she demonstrates how black music and blackface performance brought images of transformation and transcendence into rock 'n' roll. Hale argues that race—as received through blackface minstrelsy—was central to the new outsider culture, from Elvis to the Beats to the folk music revival that valorized a kind of performed authenticity as a vehicle for personal transformation. The outsider stance had no stable political direction, appealing equally to conservative rebels who followed William F. Buckley, Jr., civil rights workers, Students for a Democratic Society members, or Hunter S. Thompson whose brand of libertarianism “exemplified how the romance of the outsider produced an ambiguous politics” (p. 134).

After demonstrating the complex mixture of ideas and sensibilities that made up the outsider desire for transformation and transcendence, Hale, in her most original contribution, shows the outsider in action. Her chapter on the origins of the New Left places love and a shared emotional bond encapsulated by the romance of the outsider at the center of the student movement's political rise. The concept of participatory democracy intellectually fused Albert Camus and C. Wright Mills, but it arose from a sense of deep alienation and a desire for psychological independence, cultural power, and a right to self-expression. Without slighting the political and intellectual contributions of the student rebellion, Hale emphasizes how the movement emerged from a desire for “feeling real” (p. 180).

White romanticism for the outsider provided the foundation for a new politics, but it also created an impossible contradiction, one that black power exposed. From Elvis's swiveling hips to Norman Mailer's “The White Negro” (1957) to Freedom Summer, whites had depended on African Americans to be the outsiders. The resulting objectifying identification with black Americans reached a kind of peak with the “revolutionary blackface” (p. 221) of such groups as the Weather Underground, who framed their desire for self-invention and community around “the symbolic power of blackness” (p. 223). The resulting politics was a dead end, not only because of the limited appeal of violence, but because it gave no place for actual African Americans to participate as equals—they had to remain as outsiders to serve the symbolic needs of white middle-class Americans. By racializing the concept of “the real,” whites kept for themselves the “privilege of self-invention” (p. 236), ultimately creating a new type of minstrelsy.

The final section of the book documents how the New Right, possibly even more than the earlier groups, arose from an outsider sensibility combining a desire for personal transformation with estrangement from modern American culture. Following both the New Left and the hippie counterculture, the New Right focused on alienation as an organizing principle for a community of outsiders, building their own alternative institutions and setting out to take over the Republican Party. Hale takes us from the hippie Christians of the 1970s to the founding of the Moral Majority in 1979 to Randall Terry's Operation Rescue in the 1980s and demonstrates how abortion became the central issue that linked both personal transformation narratives and the radical reorganization of fundamentalism toward political engagement. Importantly, unlike earlier postwar rebel groups, fundamentalist Christians in the 1970s overwhelmingly came from working-class and lower middle-class communities; they derived their moral power from their sense of themselves as aggrieved and oppressed victims of mainstream American culture. By the end of this era, the outsider stance was available to anyone for individual self-fashioning or group identity.

DEWAR MACLEOD

William Paterson University

CARRIE PITZULO. Bachelors and Bunnies: The Sexual Politics of Playboy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 2011. Pp. ix, 240. $25.00.

Launched by Hugh Hefner on a shoestring budget in late 1953, Playboy quickly established itself as America's leading men's magazine. The 70,000 copies of Playboy's first issue flew off newsstands, its monthly circulation leaped to nearly a million a month by 1959, and the magazine reached a peak audience of seven million during the early 1970s. Playboy's features on stylish consumerism set a tone of high-living in a world of hectic hedonism, but it was the magazine's erotic pin-ups and centerfolds that guaranteed its reputation for risqué license.

Playboy's centerfolds generated prodigious sales, but they also attracted a welter of criticism. For moral crusaders the magazine was a font of dissolute impiety, while many feminists berated Playboy for what they saw as its rank sexism and degrading objectification of women. Carrie Pitzulo presents a very different portrait of the magazine and its iconic creator. For Pitzulo, Playboy was more complex than its critics recognized. Re-evaluating the magazine's treatment of womanhood, feminism, masculinity, monogamy, and romance, Pitzulo argues that Playboy's sexual politics were decidedly liberal and progressive, and were "more pro-woman, even quasi-feminist, than previously acknowledged" (p. 7).

Tracing the winding path of Playboy's development, Pitzulo scrutinizes the magazine's constructions of gender and the way these were not only constituent of, but actively contributed to, profound shifts in American sexual identities. Pitzulo concedes that elements of chauvinism were clearly detectable in Playboy in its early years. The magazine, she argues, reflected a broader climate of anxiety about the reconfiguration of gender roles and their attendant power relations during the 1950s, with articles that "criticized modern womanhood as emasculating and lamented the downtrodden American male" (p. 23). Nevertheless, Pitzulo argues that Playboy's sexual politics were always ambivalent and conflicted. Despite elements of misogyny, she contends, the magazine was characterized by a subtle, budding attitude that "encouraged sexual autonomy, expression, and pleasure for men and for women" (p. 25). This attitude, moreover, became more pronounced during the 1960s and 1970s as, Pitzulo argues, Playboy embraced a more politicized and socially aware outlook, and helped pioneer more egalitarian forms of gender and sexual relations.

Pitzulo explores the evolution and cultural significance of Playboy through a series of thematically and chronologically arranged chapters. Beginning with an account of the magazine's early years, she shows how Hefner crafted an editorial package that went against the grain of conformism and sexual conservatism prevalent in the 1950s by espousing a credo of "urbanity, liberal politics, style, love of leisure, and lack of familial commitment" (p. 18). There was, however, a misogynistic edge to this sybaritic agenda. Pitzulo demonstrates how Playboy's eulogy to the good life was accompanied by a fixation with contemporary notions of "womanization," which not only belittled women but cast them as actively undermining American men's status and self-confidence. Nevertheless, Pitzulo emphasizes the magazine's contradictory relationship with femininity.

Alongside its chauvinism, Pitzulo argues, Playboy also offered women possibilities for empowerment—particularly (and perhaps somewhat paradoxically) in its pin-ups and centerfolds. While feminist critics have traditionally lambasted Playboy for representing women as exhibits laid out before an objectifying patriarchal gaze, Pitzulo offers a revisionist perspective, arguing that the magazine offered a relatively positive image of postwar feminine sexuality. Playboy's pin-ups, she argues, challenged prevailing mores which emphasized women's sexual passivity, and instead provided images that "made female sexuality a joyous and normal experience" (p. 39) and offered an avenue through which women might claim "an autonomous sexuality for themselves" (p. 70).

Reviewing Playboy's heyday during the 1960s and early 1970s, Pitzulo shows how the magazine positioned itself as an arbiter of sophisticated masculine consumption. But alongside its rampant materialism, Playboy was also a standard-bearer for an array of liberal causes such as civil rights and the emerging drug culture. And, while Hefner and his magazine were reviled by leaders of the developing women's movement, Pitzulo highlights the way the magazine took an especially progressive stance on women's causes, donating large sums to abortion rights organizations and daycare centers, and financially backing the American Civil Liberties Union's work on women's rights. While hardly a "feminist" magazine, therefore, Pitzulo convincingly demonstrates the conflicts and contradictions central to the Playboy universe. She shows that Hefner "was not the 'pig' that many critics have made him out to be" (p. 149).

In making her case, Pitzulo marshals a formidable array of absorbing primary sources. Close textual analysis of Playboy itself is supplemented by original interviews with Hefner and assorted editorial staff, as well as fascinating "behind-the-scenes" memos and correspondence from the magazine's archive. Eloquent and rich in empirical detail, her study gives an enthralling account of the way Playboy both molded and mirrored shifts in American culture and sexual politics during the mid to late twentieth century. It is sure to appeal not only to social and cultural historians but to a wide general readership.

BILL OSGERBY

London Metropolitan University

ERIN HATTON. The Temp Economy: From Kelly Girls to Permatemps in Postwar America. Foreword by NELSON LICHTENSTEIN. Philadelphia: Temple University Press. 2011. Pp. xvi, 212. $26.95.

The employment of American workers on a temporary basis has increased steadily in the past few decades. In 2010, as businesses emerged from the "Great Recession," temporary positions accounted for a quarter of all new private-sector jobs; this development raises fundamental questions about the future workforce. Will temporary jobs become the main model of employment in the economy? Will workers eventually have no job benefits or job security? In this short, engaging book, Erin Hatton explores the rise and evolution of temporary employment in the United States since World War II. Her study shows how a handful of firms popularized the hiring of "temps" and also challenged the common assumption that loyal, full-time workers were assets to businesses.

This story begins in the 1950s, when employment agencies like Kelly Girl and Manpower established themselves as leaders in the fledgling "temp industry." Like "first movers" in American business history, these agencies were innovative and pragmatic. Operating within the cultural environment of the time, they sent out mostly white, middle-class women to take clerical jobs, which helped the agencies convince businesses that temps were "respectable" employees who only needed a little extra money. By targeting the nation's clerical sector, the agencies minimized opposition from powerful trade unions, who had shown little interest in organizing "pink-collar" workers. To build their workforces, they promoted the benefits of temping in popular women's magazines like Good Housekeeping and Ladies' Home Journal.

In the 1970s, as the business world grew more competitive, the temp industry expanded into new areas of the economy. The industry's marketing campaigns now suggested that temps could replace any full-time workers, even the most highly skilled professionals. Through advertisements in business and trade journals, temp agencies portrayed full-time workers as costly burdens, especially those who had employer-sponsored health insurance. The agencies encouraged business leaders to replace such workers with "semi-permanent" employees, which they alone could provide.

The strategies paid off. By the 1980s, the temp industry had staffed a wide variety of work environments from gas stations and factories to hospitals and law offices. It now sent out some 400,000 workers a day, or more than twice as many as it did ten years earlier. Some companies had outsourced entire departments to temp agencies, and thus shed all responsibility for providing workers with health care coverage and other job benefits. As Hatton emphasizes, there was nothing natural or inevitable about the industry's success. It was the product of aggressive marketing strategies that tapped deeply seeded anxieties and desires in the business world. It also reflected the declining power of many trade unions, whose strength had been sapped by the movement of production facilities overseas.

The industry continued to expand throughout the late twentieth century. Between 1980 and 2000, the number of temp agencies in the United States more than doubled, rising to perhaps 10,000. Industry leaders became giant, multinational corporations in these years, and even the federal government turned many full-time jobs into temporary positions. Yet as Hatton's closing chapter explains, the industry's future was unclear. By the turn of the century, an eclectic group of activists had mounted aggressive campaigns to limit the industry's growth. As the activists pointed out, businesses could remain flexible and make higher profits without eliminating full-time jobs. For all its success, the industry currently only accounts for two percent of the nation's workforce, or roughly 2.3 million people.

Compared to many studies of contemporary workers, this book is relatively thin and limited in scope. As the introduction notes, it is not about the temp industry's impact on the national economy, or temporary workers themselves. Yet even within its carefully delineated confines, the book seems short. Hatton should have explained how it complements and extends major studies of work and employment practices. Her references to Karl Marx and Charles Babbage seem perfunctory and incomplete, and several other prominent figures who explored the degrading effects of industrial development are all together ignored. More surprising is the lack of attention to leading studies of the advertising business. The temp industry, this book might have stressed, relied on time-tested strategies to augment its products. Of less importance is the author's tendency to repeat herself, and even repeat the words of advertisers.

Such criticisms aside, this is a valuable and interesting study. Even the most popular labor and business history textbooks ignore the relevance of temporary workers in modern times and the nefarious ways that firms have exploited temps. Anyone interested in the plight of American workers and modern employment practices should enjoy this book. It draws on a wide range of primary sources, including many industry publications, court cases, and government documents, and it is easy to read.

JAMES P. KRAFT
University of Hawai'i

PETER EISENSTADT. Rochdale Village: Robert Moses, 6,000 Families, and New York City's Great Experiment in Integrated Housing. (American Institutions and Society.) Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press. 2010. Pp. xi, 323. $35.00.

This study is ultimately a disheartening book for those who still believe in the value and feasibility of racial integration, but an important and worthwhile one nevertheless. Peter Eisenstadt, editor of The Encyclopedia of New York State (2005), makes a convincing case that Rochdale Village—which, when it opened in December 1963, was the largest housing cooperative in the world and possibly the largest integrated housing development in the United States—is a story that deserves to be rescued from obscurity. Located on the site of the shuttered Jamaica Racetrack in South Jamaica, Queens, the third-largest African American neighborhood in New York City, this cooperative housing development was home to nearly 5,900 families, roughly eighty percent of whom were white (overwhelmingly Jewish) and twenty percent of whom were black. Rochdale, Eisenstadt asserts, "was the perfect test case for integration, an integrated community with integrated schools, achieved (as many moderate organizations demanded) without busing, where (as some progressive and African American organizations insisted) black and white teachers lived and sent their children to school in the same community in which they taught" (p. 192).

There are reasons to quibble with this claim. South Jamaica had, by 1960, become increasingly poor, which enhanced the possibility that Rochdale's working- and middle-class residents would relocate if school quality declined or they felt their personal safety threatened. Residents were part of a limited equity cooperative in which they owned shares and could vote for project management but could not resell their apartments on the private market. Without deep roots in the new development or concerns about selling their homes at a loss, residents were able to move fairly easily. By the early 1970s, white families began departing in substantial numbers, along with a smaller number of black families, and this experiment in integration evolved rather rapidly into “a stable, relatively inexpensive home for the upwardly mobile black middle class”—itself a valuable thing (p. 221).

The early part of the book explores the genesis of Rochdale as an unlikely collaboration between Abraham Kazan, the “utopian” head of the United Housing Foundation, which became the largest builder of co-operative housing in New York City, and the “anti-utopian” Robert Moses. The Rochdale project did not follow “the power broker’s” familiar script: it involved no human relocations (only horses from the racetrack), and Moses, at this point “a lion in winter,” held this project dear as “an answer to the many critics who charged him with being indifferent to civil rights and minority aspirations” (pp. 34–35). (Notably, Robert Caro does not mention Rochdale Village in his massive biography of Moses.)

Largely legitimate concerns with school safety and quality, as well as rising rates of crime, fueled the white exodus from Rochdale. Ironically, although Rochdale Village was created by a consortium of unions, many conflicts there revolved around the actions of organized labor, including protests over the lack of minorities hired to construct the development, an explosive strike by Rochdale’s security guards and maintenance personnel in 1978, and—most significantly—the 1968 strike by the United Federation of Teachers that pitted supporters of the largely Jewish teachers union against backers of minority communities who demanded greater control over local schools. The strike sparked escalating and enduring racial tensions throughout the five boroughs.

Eisenstadt is no disinterested chronicler of Rochdale Village, having lived there from 1964 (when he was ten) to 1973. His personal anecdotes enliven the historical narrative, and there is no indication that his account is slanted because of his personal involvement. Though for the most part well written, the book occasionally switches awkwardly from a serious tone to a conversational one and back again. Eisenstadt might have abbreviated some of the discussion of Kazan and Moses’s unlikely partnership and augmented his analysis of the broader lessons of this saga (though perhaps I am falling into the reviewer’s trap of asking why he did not write the book I would have written). One of the most insightful passages ponders the “blessing” and the “curse” of Rochdale’s opening in the 1960s, “the decade of both racial possibility and rage,” when hopes for racial harmony scraped against widespread concerns with growing crime and disorder. There are, of course, no definitive answers as to whether an earlier or later opening of Rochdale Village might have resulted in more durable integration. Whatever the case, Eisenstadt has performed a service to scholars of race, housing, and New York City by shedding light on this understudied case.

CHRISTOPHER BONASTIA
Lehman College and the Graduate Center,
City University of New York

DAYO F. GORE. Radicalism at the Crossroads: African American Women Activists in the Cold War. New York: New York University Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 231. $39.00.

ERIK S. MCDUFFIE. Sojourning for Freedom: Black Women, American Communism, and the Making of Black Left Feminism. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press. 2011. Pp. xiv, 311. Cloth $84.95, paper $23.95.

The histories of the domestic Cold War and the twentieth-century African American freedom struggle have both been undergoing dramatic revision in recent years. Scholars of post-World War II politics and society have increasingly substituted a focus on contradiction and undercurrents of change for the traditional emphasis on consensus and conformity, while historians of race and reform have traced the contours of a “long civil rights movement” that reaches back to the prewar years and encompasses new groups and individuals. Further, a prodigious and influential scholarship examining the relationship between anticommunism and civil rights activism has directed attention to the racial foundations of postwar American politics. But, with few exceptions, that work has remained focused on the words and deeds of men, replicating political history’s longstanding presumption that American politics is gendered male.

Dayo F. Gore and Erik S. McDuffie both restore African American women to their rightful place within the radical black activist tradition. Gore explores the efforts of a network of women who worked within a communist milieu, mostly in Harlem, during the early Cold War years when some scholars have argued that McCarthyism had decimated the Left in general and the black Left in particular. McDuffie’s chronological focus is broader, encompassing the activism of black left feminists (using literary scholar Mary Helen Washington’s terminology) during the span of the Old Left, but many of these women make appearances in both texts. Despite these distinct periodizations, these books, both of which originated as dissertations within the New York University history department, share a basic concern to assert the significance of radical black women’s mid-century theorizing and activism. Their interventions and arguments are markedly parallel.

McDuffie and Gore both emphasize that their subjects refigured Marxist-Leninist theory through their lived experiences as black women to create a radical tradition that transcended the intentions and beliefs of Communist Party (CP) officials. Women such as Grace P. Campbell and Esther Cooper Jackson (for McDuffie) and Marvel Cooke and Vicki Garvin (for Gore) worked within the CP, in communist-affiliated or-supported groups such as the Harlem Tenants League and the National Negro Labor Council, and in broader coalitional formations such as the Cold War-era Sojourners for Truth and Justice, to foster black women’s survival and empowerment, to build their participation within radical movements, and to convince their male comrades of the significance of black women as a revolutionary force. Both authors argue that black women in the communist orbit originated theories that integrated gender, race, and class as analytic categories long before women of color theorists made "intersectionality" a watchword in the late twentieth century. This is an argument that has also been advanced by Carole Boyce Davies, biographer of Claudia Jones; but while Gore and McDuffie both acknowledge Jones's contributions to Marxist theory, they insist that she must be placed within a broader community of radical black women who developed these ideas together, in their organizing as well as their writing.

Beyond the similarity of this central argument, the books share several other concerns and insights. Both authors investigate the ways that travel shaped their subjects' worldview and political orientation. In particular, McDuffie emphasizes that their journeys to the Soviet Union convinced a number of black women to join the CP, and he argues convincingly that, especially in the early years, their admiration for Soviet women's relative freedom made these sojourns a gendered experience, part of the production of a "black women's international" that fostered transnational identifications and collaborations. Both authors take issue with interpretations of black women's civil rights activism that frame them as simply behind-the-scenes grassroots activists or so-called "bridge leaders" and suggest that the communist milieu created some opportunities for women's formal leadership, even as they were also often limited by sexism and racism within the party. Finally, McDuffie and Gore both emphasize that radical black women influenced the new social movements of the 1960s and 1970s, tracing the ways that their ideas anticipated later feminist theorizing and outlining their direct support for such movements, for example, as participants in the "Free Angela Davis" campaign and as staff and contributors for Freedomways magazine.

Nonetheless, there are some significant differences in focus and interpretation. Most obviously, McDuffie's broader time span permits him to account for changes in black women's experience within the CP as the party's relationship to the American political scene shifted, while also demonstrating that they usually functioned as "outsiders within" the Left. Following about a dozen women as they moved into and sometimes out of the CP, he highlights their contributions to radical organizing in the earliest years of the Workers' Party, the breadth of their involvement in Depression-era initiatives centered around Scottsboro and consumer organizing, and their efforts during the Popular Front era to defend black women workers, to elect communists to public office, and to create radical organizations that promoted serious attention to their particular concerns as black women. McDuffie's discussion of the Cold War era is particularly strong in its treatment of the Sojourners for Truth and Justice, an organization created by black left feminists within and outside the CP that asserted their leadership in the African American freedom struggle and forged bonds with both black South African women and anti-racist white women in the United States. Throughout he succeeds in refuting the view, still current among some scholars, that black activists were "duped" by a CP that used them for its own ends.

McDuffie's most sustained argument, that black women on the Left collectively created a radical theory that specifically highlighted their "triple exploitation" and asserted black women's "vanguard center" role, is persuasive for the wartime and postwar years, but some readers might be less convinced that these theoretical interventions were present from the beginning. The necessarily speculative nature of McDuffie's discussion of early black left feminists' street corner speeches or participation in tenant organizations, for example, sustains his position that they found within the communist milieu a productive site for reorienting radicalism around their own needs. Nonetheless, his repeated insistence on their articulation of a specific theoretical intervention struck me as unsubstantiated and possibly ahistorical, too reflective of current formulations.

Gore's focus on a specific time period allows a more fine-grained and in-depth assessment of the vigor of radical black women's activism and the quality of their leadership during what has been presumed to be the nadir of the early Cold War. While McDuffie also notes that black left feminists did their "most sophisticated work" (p. 22) during the Cold War years, he contends that they were "largely crushed and sidetracked" (p. 162) by anticommunist repression. Not so, according to Gore, who provides a coherent and compelling portrait of the ways that the domestic Cold War actually provided openings that fostered radical black women's "central role in sustaining radical resistance" (p. 2). Internal conflicts within the CPUSA as well as the need for new leadership as communist men were persecuted or went underground created opportunities for radical black women to staff emerging groups, debate revolutionary theories, and organize around new issues. Gore details black women's debates with black men and white women over the nature of gender and racial oppression and highlights the ways in which they shaped the labor feminism of the 1950s. In one especially fascinating chapter, she examines black women radicals' extensive organizing in defense of Rosa Lee Ingram, who along with her two sons was sentenced to death for the murder of a white sharecropper. While Ingram's case was also taken up by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and the Civil Rights Congress, Gore shows that when these organizations' interest flagged, African American women in and around the CP rallied to draw attention to the role of sexualized violence in racial oppression. Against McDuffie's interpretation of this Cold War era activism as limited by its "familialist" framing and its lack of forthright critique of gender and sexual norms, Gore emphasizes that radical black women in the 1950s rejected a politics of silence and advocated for black women's right to self-defense. More than McDuffie, she emphasizes the ways in which black women on the Left were able to exploit the contradictions of Cold War repression to mount ever more radical challenges to the postwar liberal order.

In her conclusion, Gore quotes Esther Cooper Jackson, who plays an important role in both of these narratives: "A lot was happening . . . between 1950 and 1955" (p. 163). As these books reveal, radical black women made sure that "a lot was happening" throughout the period of the Old Left. McDuffie and Gore both demonstrate not only that black women were vital thinkers and activists within the Left, but also that these women must be reckoned with if scholars are to understand American communists' signal contributions to twentieth- and twenty-first-century political culture. The similarities in their treatments provide definitive evidence of the possibilities, constraints, and legacy of black women's radical work, while the differences give us access to a broader range of activists, groups, and issues. Together, these books go far to illuminate the ways that gender, race, and class intersected to shape the American Left.

ANDREA FRIEDMAN

Washington University in St. Louis

JEFFREY A. TURNER. Sitting In and Speaking Out: Student Movements in the American South, 1960–1970. Athens: University of Georgia Press. 2010. Pp. x, 347. Cloth $69.95, paper $24.95.

With his new work, Jeffrey A. Turner intends to redeem the American South—at least with regard to the region's image concerning student activism. Turner asserts that too much attention has been paid to campus activism in the North and West and not nearly enough emphasis has been placed on southern campuses. Although valiant in its intentions, Turner's book falls short of placing the southern student movement on par with those in other regions. That is not to say, however, that the book is not interesting or informative.

The monograph features a wide array of sources from many southern institutions. Turner dutifully consulted archival and oral history collections from the leading predominantly white universities in the region to construct the bulk of the book's narrative. For its discussion of black student activism, however, the study relies heavily on student newspapers at historically black institutions. Even if not intentional, the dearth of material on black activism is noticeable. Regarding secondary literature, the book looks mostly to scholarship that was available between 1960 and 2000, leaving a minor gap in the recent historiography of student activism. Turner explains that the book "took a long time to write" (p. ix), and that is sometimes the reason for such gaps.

The book's arguments, at times, outstretch the evidence provided. For instance, when discussing activism at the University of Florida, the book claims a "significant university movement" arose from a 1963 off-campus sit-in (p. 98). Unfortunately, the book does not provide much evidence that the two were directly connected. Further, the fact that the book only mentions the university twice more in some fifty pages undermines the significance of the University of Florida movement. This points to another problem with the book; it conflates off-campus activism with on-campus policy changes. The book explains that students (mostly white) often pushed to change society off campus and were prevented from, or at least less likely to try, protesting issues regarding racial discrimination and the Vietnam War on their campuses until the late 1960s. Turner highlights the National Student Association to discuss some of the organizing that occurred around southern campuses and argues that role of Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) has been overemphasized in the student movement. While one can readily concede that SDS has captured the attention of much of the past scholarship surrounding student activism, it would be difficult to deny objectively that SDS's reach extended farther than most student-centered organizations during the period.

Indeed, the book under review reveals the names of the minority of white students who pushed for desegregation in the South's colleges during the early 1960s. Even the author has to admit, however, the student movement to prevent desegregation was much larger and more effective, as it took federal rulings and military troops finally to desegregate some of the South's flagship universities. These desegregation rulings often occurred not because of the activism of students on campus but because of the negative light segregation cast on the nation during the height of the Cold War. The cadre of black lawyers and activists associated with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), and Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) should also receive credit. As Turner explains, "the white student activists of 1963 and 1964 owed a great debt to black students and community activists for providing organizing issues and tactical models" (p. 95).

In his redemptive effort, Turner has simplified the North in much the same way that some scholars have done the South. By North, the author refers to northern, midwestern, and northeastern campuses. Although the book claims that the South is at the epicenter of the social movements associated with the 1960s, much of the narrative is spent describing the distinct anti-radical nature of southern student activism. The fundamental question, then, is whether these students, who were limited by the confines of a conservative campus and community culture, effected significant and broad-sweeping change at their institutions in the way that students at Berkeley, San Francisco State, Columbia, or Cornell did? In spite of Turner's efforts, the answer is no.

The value of Turner's work, however, is the awareness it brings of student activism in the South. While ambitious, the book is perhaps too wide in scope to treat effectively the movements on campuses across the entire South. Although the book claims to feature a "bi-racial focus," it is still a story driven largely by the activities of white liberals with black activists playing a side role. Also, noticeably absent from the narrative is attention to collegiate athletics, which may have filled out some of the discussion about desegregation. In spite of its shortcomings, those studying student activism will find Turner's work useful.

STEFAN M. BRADLEY
Saint Louis University

TIMOTHY J. MINCHIN and JOHN A. SALMOND. After the Dream: Black and White Southerners since 1965. (Civil Rights and the Struggle for Black Equality in the Twentieth Century.) Lexington: University Press of Kentucky. 2011. Pp. x, 405. $40.00.

Timothy J. Minchin and John A. Salmond provide a well-crafted synthesis of almost half a century of scholarship on race and rights in the American South, augmenting their story with fresh evidence from state archives, particularly letters to elected officials. Divided into thirteen chapters, the book begins where most works on civil rights end—enactment of the Voting Rights Act of 1965—and proceeds chronologically to the election of Barack Obama in 2008. Topics covered include the relatively quick integration of public accommodations in the South, including parks, buses, and stores, and a dramatic rise in black political power thanks to federal oversight of elections in southern states.

However, as scholars like Kevin Kruse, Joseph Crespino, and Matthew Lassiter have shown, black voting power and desegregated space proved less meaningful once white flight began to grip southern cities in the 1970s, moving educational and economic opportunities to ring suburbs far from urban black communities. Minchin and Salmond both show how in Montgomery, “the focus of commercial life shifted to the expanding suburbs” in Atlanta, meaning that many of the civil rights movement’s “victories” including the famous bus boycott “were undermined” (p. 185). White flight also led to white students moving out of predominantly black districts or, alternately, into private schools. Both phenomena adversely affected the remaining black students.

Rural areas tended to boast better records of integration than urban schools, but black farms struggled and rural populations declined overall; whites moved straight to sunbelt suburbs, and blacks moved to inner cities. Here, economics did much of the work once assigned to Jim Crow. Better jobs and better pay accrued to white workers and major corporations shied from relocating to black majority areas like North Carolina’s Soul City (p. 190). Although many hoped that Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act might reverse such economic racism by quelling discrimination in private hiring, the “mechanisms” created by the act proved unable to “handle the dimensions of the problem” (p. 141). This became particularly true during the 1980s, when the Reagan administration recommended that the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission reduce its staff by ten percent and “required” that accusers in discrimination charges “prove intent and not just that a firm has a lower percentage of minority workers” (p. 210).

Overall, Minchin and Salmond argue that much remains to be done before true racial parity is achieved in the American South, even as they acknowledge that the forces perpetuating inequality are private, decentralized, and difficult to legislate away. They find hopeful signs in the public acknowledgment of the South’s racist past, particularly its commemoration of civil rights as a positive contribution to “the heritage tourist industry” (p. 259). The rise of “atonement trials” bringing justice to black victims of racist violence—often decades after the crimes against them were committed—mark another positive development (p. 267).

Although much in this book will be familiar to scholars of the twentieth century, the authors do a good job of synthesizing the massive, diffuse literature on the topic—making it an attractive option for survey courses on civil rights or the post-World War II South. They make a novel contribution to the prevailing literature by underscoring the continued importance that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) played in implementing civil rights reform after 1965. Temporarily eclipsed during the direct action phase of the civil rights movement, the NAACP returned to the forefront of the battle for racial equality during the complex implementation phase of the story. Also new is Minchin and Salmond’s recovery of the Southern Regional Council’s recent history, a topic that has yet to receive sustained attention.

ANDERS WALKER
School of Law,
Saint Louis University

LEIGH RAIFORD. Imprisoned in a Luminous Glare: Photography and the African American Freedom Struggle. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 293. $45.00.

In this book, Leigh Raiford takes an incisive look at photography and the anti-lynching, civil rights, and black power movements. Her goal is not just to illuminate the way these movements used photography for political ends but to show how they shaped the politics of photography and black visibility, with consequences that remain in force today.

Raiford focuses on three sites of struggle: the body, the eye (or spectatorship), and memory. Raiford begins with the anti-lynching campaign, a potent starting point. Lynching, a violent act compounded by trafficking in images of the murdered, put the black body in the foreground. Activists such as Ida B. Wells used lynching photographs as evidence at a time when words—particularly those of an African American woman—were not convincing enough to stop such murders. These horrific images played opposite other photographs employed by the movement that depicted black men such as James Weldon Johnson, who led the failed effort to enact a legislative ban on lynching, as professional and respectable. Raiford then considers how audiences differing by gender, geographic region, and class saw lynching photographs. Bringing the analysis forward in time, Raiford discusses the powerful place these photographs have in black memory and looks at reactions to the recent exhibition first called "Witness" and then "Without Sanctuary."

Photographic images became even more central in the freedom struggles of the 1960s. Organizations such as the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) understood the power of photography and first used it as a corrective, presenting evidence of discrimination and violence in protests. Moving beyond this reactionary position, SNCC became more proactive, creating a photo agency within the organization and thinking about how to represent African Americans to themselves, not merely or solely to white Americans. One of the more notable examples of this change was the new visibility of forceful black women. Largely absent from the photographs of the anti-lynching movement, black women were at the center of protests in the 1960s, seen facing off against white police officers. Photographers in the movement often took their images from the front lines of the struggle. Battles over professional versus amateur and the ownership and use of equipment exemplified tensions within SNCC itself.

Raiford argues that the black power movement signaled an "emergent visibility" of African Americans, a new fascination and attraction particularly among whites. In the "society of the spectacle" of the 1960s, as Guy Debord theorizes, racialized bodies were necessary, and the iconic status of black men with guns met these expectations. Raiford traces how these images became incorporated into the Black Panther Party and then institutionalized, so much a part of the movement that it became impossible to understand the party without them. Activists attentive to this change began to recognize that the struggle had come to be one over the politics of representation rather than visibility per se.

This is a careful analysis, intent on destabilizing the indexical and iconic power we often attribute to photographs. Raiford employs a great deal of theory to expose how this fixity is built, reinforced, and transversed as she moves fluidly among theory, image, and historical circumstance. There is less attention, however, to historical argument, one that does not just expose the conditions of the past but reveals the move from one set of conditions to another. Part of this inattention is due to the depth of analysis Raiford brings to each historical moment. But it also derives from the author's commitment to give primacy to multiple interpretations. What we lose by this choice is an understanding of change that does not erase multiple interpretations but reveals the force attributed to certain interpretations at specific times. Raiford gives little attention to the increased number of images over time or how the meaning of still images changed in eras dominated by moving ones on television, movie, and computer screens. We confer iconicity to photographs by continuing to view them apart from other media. Raiford exposes the multiple consequences of being "imprisoned in a luminous glare"—a phrase of Martin Luther King, Jr.—but does not explain why the scope of that glare has grown even as discrimination has become more subtle. These, then, are efforts to be continued. Raiford provides an insightful and necessary foundation to do so.

JULIA L. FOULKES
The New School

SIMON HALL. American Patriotism, American Protest: Social Movements since the Sixties. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 2011. Pp. 215. $55.00.

Patriotism may indeed, in Samuel Johnson's familiar words, constitute the "last refuge of a scoundrel," but Simon Hall demonstrates its undeniable institutionalization as a protest strategy. Joining a growing historiographic movement, Hall repudiates the idea that U.S. protest culture evaporated after the 1960s. The author examines post-1960s grassroots social movements and concludes that they survived and thrived into the next decade and beyond. That he reaches this conclusion should come as no particular surprise when one considers the growing scholarship pointing to a continuation of 1960s-style goals, tactics, and ideologies in the putatively more conservative decades that followed. What is decidedly innovative, however, is that Hall considers not only movements such as gay rights and women's liberation that furthered the socially progressive goals of inclusion and egalitarianism, but also evaluates the activism of social conservatives from busing opponents to tax revolters to anti-abortion advocates. Among the many parallelisms Hall turns up are a preponderance of tactics and strategies lifted from the playbook of 1960s radicals and a propensity to play the patriotism card by invoking the American republic's founding ideals.

Hall's opening chapter establishes the dynamics of patriotism and protest in 1960s activism, arguing that far from descending into "bitterness and despair" and abandoning "an Americanism that they viewed as inherently flawed by sexism, racism, militarism and capitalist excess" (p. 6), the Left consistently invoked the country's fundamental democratic and egalitarian principles. Although this was most obvious in the civil rights movement and in groups like Students for a Democratic Society, Hall also documents the trend in less likely manifestations, such as within the antiwar movement (particularly in the case of Vietnam Veterans Against the War) and in the Black Panthers' appeals to the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence to legitimate revolutionary politics.

This sets the scene for Hall's five case studies of post-1960s social movements. In each chapter the author follows a consistent blueprint, leading with a salient vignette of patriotic protest in the gay rights, women's liberation, anti-busing, tax revolt, and anti-abortion movements, briefly elucidating the pertinent historical background, then analyzing each movement's links to the 1960s protest tradition and its appeals to patriotic sentiments. This approach produces several unexpected revelations. The executive director of the Los Angeles Gay and Lesbian Center equated the gay agenda with that upon which the United States was founded, referring to the gay rights movement as “a patriotic battle of the highest order” to foster greater inclusiveness in the nation’s ideals of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. 1970s tax revolt activists not only parroted 1960s protest tactics, burning assessment notices instead of draft cards, they also included veterans of the antiwar and black power movements among their ranks. Anti-busing activists appropriated rights language from the previous decade’s struggle for racial freedom and even, on more than one occasion, sang “We Shall Overcome” at their protests. Feminists mobilized the symbolic power of the Statue of Liberty and the Bicentennial to underscore the “200-year old promise” of “equality of opportunity” on behalf of the Equal Rights Amendment. They also used the Declaration of Independence’s “pursuit of happiness” clause to frame the case for abortion rights, a strategy, ironically, that they shared with anti-abortion activists, who argued that this “inalienable right” should be extended to “innocent pre-born human beings” (p. 132).

Such insights are provocative, but Hall sometimes undermines their potency by recounting a dense litany of corroborating examples to support his argument. Perhaps this is because he has diligently researched a bountiful set of archival sources and effectively integrated pertinent insights from the existing scholarship in the fields of social movement and recent U.S. history. His discussion of the gay rights movement cleverly makes use of archival materials from regional chapters of the Mattachine Society to establish that use of the language of Americanism to promote wider acceptance for homosexuals predated the Stonewall riots that are often positioned as “year zero” in popular accounts of gay liberation. Still, Hall would have benefited from allowing himself to theorize more about the larger meaning and implications of his argument rather than merely documenting that direct action protest continued after the 1960s and that activists often invoked the language of patriotism. In the brief conclusion, Hall finally allows himself the latitude for welcome speculation, contrasting progressives’ use of patriotic rhetoric to highlight “the gap between rhetoric and reality” (p. 142) with conservatives’ invocation of the nation’s past to turn back the clock of religious and moral values. Hall hazards the further conjecture that patriotic protest “probably” contributed to the “sharp divisions” (p. 142) in contemporary American politics by inflating rhetoric in ways that reduced room for compromise. This study represents a commendable addition to the literature on social movements and recent U.S. history, but it would have benefited from integrating more of these insights into the book’s main text.

BRADFORD MARTIN
Bryant University

JOHN MCMILLIAN. Smoking Typewriters: The Sixties Underground Press and the Rise of Alternative Media in America. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. xiv, 277. $27.95.

In Smoking Typewriters, John McMillian sets out to explore the significance and legacy of the underground press of the 1960s. McMillian argues that the numerous activist and countercultural weeklies and monthlies of the 1960s were central to building up the youth rebellion of the time; that in their organization and production they embodied a democratic spirit and seriousness of mission; and that they practiced a creative journalism that stood in sharp contrast to the mainstream media’s unquestioned societal assumptions. McMillian insists that historians of the era have underestimated the underground press’s significance.

McMillian is correct in championing the importance of underground papers to white youth activism in the 1960s. Through detailed studies of a number of underground papers McMillian demonstrates that these papers often arose out of small radical or “avant-garde” communities. Invariably, however, the papers did not just reflect those communities, but “accelerated the[ir] growth and development” (p. 37). Moreover, the existence of these papers, and their linkage through national associations—the Underground Press Syndicate and the Liberation News Service—helped to transform a sense of local radical or countercultural community into a sense of national community. In the words of activist Jerry Rubin, the underground press “define[d] an alternative community and . . . [gave] it a voice and a consciousness and an identity” (p. 72). Yippie leader Abbie Hoffman insisted that the underground press was the “visible manifestation of an alternative culture” and that it helped “to create a national identity” for activists (p. 189).

McMillian does a fine job of conveying a sense of the seriousness and integrity of some of the early efforts at building a radical media in the United States. It is hard, for example, not to be moved by the humility and earnestness of many of these young people as McMillian presents them. For example, he quotes Michael Kindman, founder of Lansing, Michigan’s The Paper: “We hope never to become so sure of our position and so unaware of our real job that we will concentrate merely on putting out a paper” (p. 50).

While McMillian successfully contrasts the underground press with mainstream journalism, he falls short in his understanding of just how deeply immersed the underground press itself was in dominant American culture. He acknowledges, for example, that the New Left, out of which the underground press developed, was “a largely white . . . and male-dominated movement” (p. 12), but he fails to recognize fully the implications of this fact. The underground press was not simply the province of young white men, but it reflected, in its mindset, an American white male perspective, even as it struggled to criticize and transform American society. We see this most clearly in how McMillian handles the rampant sexism of much of the underground press, with its photos of nude women, crude sexual headlines, classified sex ads, and a sexual division of labor in the actual production of most underground newspapers. McMillian notes this phenomenon but dispenses with the need to analyze it deeply, preferring to apologize for it instead. Citing historian Beth Bailey's thinking on this sexism, McMillian asks us to see the underground press's sexually charged "words and images" as "alluring to youths," as celebrating "a pleasure ethic," and as valuing "authenticity." "Sometimes," concludes McMillian, radicals "simply reveled in making adults uncomfortable" (p. 125). Hugh Hefner and Playboy would pass this test. If the underground press was in any way "authentic" in its attitudes toward women, that authenticity lay only in its uncensored depiction of dominant white male society's actual understandings of women and sexuality. In short, the underground press here stood not in opposition to dominant American values, but only against the pretense of holding contrary values.

McMillian has produced a necessary work for those who would like to understand how the underground press contributed to the growth of the white youth rebellion in the 1960s; and he gives us, too, some sense of the texture of the times. Yet we cannot understand the underground press's full significance, or trajectory, or get a reasonably accurate feel for the period, unless we carefully explore not only those elements of the underground press which set it against American society in the twentieth century but also those elements that tied it to that same society. Unfortunately, McMillian has avoided this latter, more uncomfortable part of the story he sought to tell.

DAVID BARBER

University of Tennessee at Martin

JONATHAN B. KRASNER. The Benderly Boys and American Jewish Education. (Brandeis Series in American Jewish History, Culture, and Life.) Waltham, Mass.: Brandeis University Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 498. Cloth $95.00, paper $39.95.

Scholars of American Jewish history and historians of American education share a common lament. Both consider that the work they do, regardless of their meticulous research, garners little attention or respect in the larger field of American history. Both believe that others in the historical profession see their work as narrow, antiquarian, and self-referentially parochial. Jonathan B. Krasner may feel the same way. In this study of Samson Benderly, he tackles a subject that speaks to two marginalized fields. It is hard to imagine that scholars outside of the two subgroups within the academy will ever notice this book let alone see it as contributing to larger conversations about American immigration, the construction of ethnic identity, the perceived crisis of urban youth in the Progressive era, and religion. The book will, I predict, do little to convince historians outside its two fields that Benderly ought to be considered an important or interesting figure for early to mid-twentieth-century America.

First, who was Samson Benderly, and why does Krasner consider him a worthy topic for a biography? Benderly, a native of Palestine born in 1876 in the town of Safed, broke with the religious world of his parents and came to Baltimore in 1898 to study medicine. Shortly thereafter he turned his attention to what he, and many others, considered to be the dismal state of Jewish education in immigrant communities, not just in Maryland but throughout the United States. Benderly defined, over the course of his career, an educational vision that attributed primacy to language and, in the case of Jewish education, to Hebrew. The creator of and participant in a string of local and national institutions, including schools, summer camps, bureaus of Jewish education, and professional training institutions for teachers, Benderly brought Progressive-era ideas to bear on the particular problems associated with the Jewish schooling of America's several million Jewish children. All of his projects and those of his disciples, known as the "Benderly Boys" (who in fact included a few female acolytes), focused on the broad and deep problem of how these children, in the main offspring of East European immigrants, could learn to be both Jewish and American.

Benderly's followers wanted to create schools and school systems that blended the values, ideas, and tropes of two worlds, the American and the Jewish, articulated in modern Hebrew, a language in the process of development in the Jewish colonies in Palestine. Benderly and those whom he launched professionally, who went out to teach and administer Jewish schools and camps across the United States, had little doubt that these youngsters would become American, but they had no confidence as to what the Jewish content of their lives would be.

Krasner's Benderly and his boys faced two enormous challenges. The greater one came from the power of American institutions and culture to integrate immigrants and to usher them, linguistically in particular, into the larger society. Given the immigrants' (and more importantly their children's) relatively rapid movement out of the working class, in large measure through the vehicle of public education, Benderly confronted a tough job in trying to convince them that they ought to invest time, energy, and money into Jewish education. Benderly's other challenge came from within the Jewish world as he faced the opposition of traditionalists who did not trust Benderly personally and disliked his progressive ideas about education. Such critics had a different vision, one that did not want to harmonize the American and the Jewish. They saw that goal as a chimera, which if operationalized would be to the detriment of the Jewish part of the equation.

Within the universe of American Jewish history scholarship, this book will be a welcome, if minor, addition. That literature has long noted Benderly as a key figure, and its practitioners will be able to learn more about him and his followers. Scholars of American education may see this book as a contribution if they are interested in the flow of ideas from Progressives like John Dewey to ethnic communities. But these scholars would have been more likely to notice this book had Krasner spent any time looking at the language crises that ripped apart other immigrant groups. German communities, for example, divided profoundly between those who believed "Germanness" could be preserved in English and those who saw language and religion, language and ethnicity, as inextricably connected, asserting that only in the mother tongue could culture continue and thrive.

But Krasner's book, too detailed, too hermetically sealed in the inner developments of the Jewish world, and too devoid of a central analytic problem beyond the extent of Benderly's success, will do little to bridge the gap with which this review began.

HASIA R. DINER
New York University

KEVIN M. SCHULTZ. Tri-Faith America: How Catholics and Jews Held Postwar America to its Protestant Promise. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 256. $34.95.

After World War II Americans learned that the democratic values of the United States were founded on the core beliefs of a plural tri-faith majority. By the end of the 1960s—as signaled by the publication of Arthur A. Cohen's The Myth of the Judeo-Christian Tradition (1970)—it had become much more difficult to defend the existence of an inclusive, broadly representative civil religion. Subsequently, the tri-faith norm, and the Judeo-Christian fundament upon which it supposedly rested, has been deconstructed as a wish-fulfilling construct of consensus historians, as an abstraction of sociologists who wished to diminish the reality of ethnic particularism, and as a Cold War ideology co-opted by the Religious Right. Kevin M. Schultz's new book asserts, to the contrary, that "tri-faith" was the principle of an interreligious movement that successfully challenged Protestant hegemony and created new liberties and rights for religious minorities.

Schultz tracks the rise of the tri-faith norm to its ascendancy in the Cold War and its persistence as an ideal, even under fire, well into the age of "the culture wars." According to Schultz, a major irony resulted from the institutionalization of religious pluralism: this caused the second disestablishment of American religion, resulting in a more secular state neutral toward all religions. This outcome was a wholly unintended consequence of those who advocated for tri-faith America. Since the 1970s it has led to the backlash against secularism characteristic of the Religious Right, which routinely invokes Judeo-Christian values to rally "co-belligerent" conservative evangelicals, Jews, and Catholics (p. 201).

The first section of the book, "Inventing Tri-faith America, Ending 'Protestant America,'" describes how belief in theological and civic parity between Protestants, Catholics, and Jews became an article of civil religion in the United States. The protagonists of this narrative are the leaders of the National Conference of Christians and Jews (NCCJ), founded in 1928 to resist political nativism. As defined by the NCCJ, "Judeo-Christianity" had two distinct meanings: a theological one, emphasizing the Old Testament, and a civic one, promoting brotherhood, tolerance, and mutual goodwill. Both gained political and intellectual traction during World War II because religious pluralism was an anti-fascist initiative, but the civic component was particularly persuasive to agencies outside of the NCCJ.

By the end of the war, the belief in religious pluralism had become normative in the United States, and the second part of Schultz's study, "Living in Tri-faith America," examines the vicissitudes of this transformation in the national identity. Schultz's postwar narrative is influenced by Mark Silk's Spiritual Politics: Religion and America since World War II (1988), but whereas Silk's oft-cited book focuses on the fragility of religious pluralism and on the events that led to its fracture in the 1960s, Schultz describes a robust arrangement that provided a moral ballast for postwar liberalism and allowed the United States to differentiate itself from the USSR. Moreover, instead of fostering conformity and cultural homogeneity, as commentators since Will Herberg (Protestant, Catholic, Jew: An Essay in American Religious Sociology [1955]) have charged, the tri-faith arrangement actually bolstered religious communalism and provided a rationale for resisting assimilation. Schultz's analysis of how the differing religious traditions and historical experiences of Catholic and Jewish Americans shaped their attitudes toward the state and Protestant society intersects with Joshua M. Zeitz's White Ethnic New York: Jews, Catholics, and the Shaping of Postwar Politics (2007). Zeitz is trenchant in his attention to the many ways these Jewish-Catholic differences—over ideas of authority, dissent, community, and especially over anticommunism—eventually caused the breakdown of the liberal Democratic coalition. In contrast, Schultz simplistically credits the tri-faith ideal with bolstering liberalism. Schultz also mistakenly calls ex-communist Whittaker Chambers a convert to Catholicism, when in fact Chambers became a Quaker (p. 90).

A welcome balance of Schultz's book comes from its willingness to note that most proponents of religious pluralism had shortcomings of vision regarding race, even though they argued passionately for the protection of religious minorities. As Schultz puts the matter, "The very foundation of Tri-Faith America—the brotherhood of man under the Fatherhood of God—left no room for segregation . . . Yet many of these organizations chose not to insist on racial equality as part of their mission, as part of their call for 'brotherhood'" (p. 195). Nonetheless, Schultz sees tri-faith organizations as partially redeemed since they provided the religious idioms which civil rights advocates used to pronounce white Protestant monism dead.

Schultz's account of the rise of the Religious Right is conventional, and his treatment of postwar Protestantism in general is less compelling than the rest of the text. The postwar period was rife with Protestant self-critique, especially of its own complicity in conformity and suburban megachurch diffidence. Niebuhrian realists, émigrés such as Paul Tillich, neo-orthodox prophets such as Gabriel Vahanian, liberals such as Daniel Williams and Henry P. Van Dusen, and up-and-coming stars such as Martin E. Marty and Harvey Cox wrote a great deal diagnosing the health of Protestant America, and Protestants were among the first to use the terms “post-Puritan” and “post-Protestant” to describe the transformation of the United States since World War II. The omission of these voices is unfortunate, since Schultz seems to dismiss their criticisms of mainline Protestantism as “bland” theological gruel (p. 80).

Throughout this impressively researched book, Schultz consults a host of sources, including much original archival work in the NCCJ’s files, but he could have augmented his study by paying more attention to the art and popular culture of the era. In contrast to cultural historians who have written on related themes in the postwar era, such as Michael Rogin and Alan Nadel, Schultz’s handling of movies is only cursory, and he neglects a rich vein of literature by major authors—Philip Roth, Bernard Malamud, Saul Bellow, Norman Mailer, Frank O’Hara, Flannery O’Connor, Mary McCarthy, and J. F. Powers—that would have complicated his assessment of Americanization and added a missing sensitivity to theological tensions between the three religions examined here. None of these complaints, however, should diminish Schultz’s achievement. He has written a compelling, often trenchant, book that enriches our understanding of the abiding promise of religious pluralism and the failures to agree on what it would resemble in practice.

JASON STEVENS
National Humanities Center

JAMES C. BURKEE. Power, Politics, and the Missouri Synod: A Conflict That Changed American Christianity. Foreword by MARTIN E. MARTY. Minneapolis: Fortress Press. 2011. Pp. xvi, 256. $29.00.

The evangelical resurgence has become a standard theme of post-1960s American religious history. Corollaries include the growth of conservative Christian churches, the decline of more liberal groups, and (with the important exception of historically black denominations) a broader realignment along an axis that mimics the two-party system. The saga of the Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod (LCMS) stands as both a critical element in these narratives and a profound qualification of them. Like the better-known Southern Baptist Convention (SBC), the Midwest-oriented LCMS flipped from moderate to conservative control as the result of a concerted effort by a small number of dedicated activists. Unlike the SBC, though, the LCMS has not thrived so much as muddled along in the four decades following the conservative takeover. James C. Burkee, who teaches at an LCMS-affiliated university, is well positioned to tell an insider’s tale that has larger resonance.

Burkee’s story of righteous intrigue centers on two major actors. Activist and uncertified minister Herman Otten, Jr., was a reckless, self-styled McCarthyite who got the ball rolling in the mid-1950s by attacking doctrinally suspect seminary professors. LCMS president J. A. O. “Jack” Preus was a Machiavellian schemer, the Richard Nixon to Otten’s Joseph McCarthy, who used and then sought to contain the conservative insurgents who had voted him into office. The LCMS liberals—or moderates, as they preferred to call themselves—come across as alternately self-righteous and hapless. Burkee neither dwells on their purported heresies nor probes the theological values of the conservative activists. The latter oversight appears to be the responsibility not of Burkee but of the actors driving a narrative that is “about more than just theology” (p. 4). The author, who seems to have no axe to grind, should be commended for his willingness to lay bare his denomination’s past. He calls his topic “modern church history writ large” (p. 2). More specifically, it is church history writ political.

The conservative triumph occurred during the 1970s, a decade usually seen as the turning point of the evangelical resurgence. Preus assumed the presidency in 1969, taking over a centralized denominational apparatus that moderates, ironically, had helped to construct. The purges came in waves. A particularly dramatic moment occurred in 1974, when most of the faculty and students from Concordia Seminary in Saint Louis left to create “Seminex” (Seminary-in-Exile). The conservatives had routed their most entrenched opposition.

Burkee has recovered an impressive array of sources that, combined with interviews, allows him to recreate the interpersonal dynamics of what amounted to an institutional power grab. Preus had his plumber, while Otten had a cache of tape recordings. As their relationship deteriorated, Preus kept a file on Otten labeled “Blackmail,” a reasonable rendering of the latter’s modus operandi (p. 164). The book’s shifting organizational nomenclature likely will confuse many readers. They should, however, come away with a keen sense of the personalities and emotions behind each parry and riposte. No Protestant denomination is immune to cloak and dagger games, but the LCMS is in a league of its own. While the laity—at least as Burkee portrays them—were hardly sympathetic toward elite liberal seminarians, they were not exactly inspired by the other side’s political machinations.

Burkee links the LCMS insurgency with the broader conservative Right. For example, he demonstrates how one’s stance on civil rights issues could function as a litmus test in a denomination that was far from welcoming to African Americans. Otten branded the many LCMS leaders who supported civil rights legislation as communist sympathizers, scarcely distinguishing theological critiques of the Social Gospel from ideological critiques of liberal politics. "CONSERVATIVES UNITE!" declared one mid-1960s riff on a more famous manifesto. "YOU HAVE NOTHING TO LOSE BUT THE MISSOURI SYNOD!" (p. 75). Burkee mostly succeeds in situating the LCMS in a larger political context (despite confusing the dates of the Civil Rights and Voting Rights Acts [p. 57]).

Burkee highlights a grand contradiction concerning the nature of conservative LCMS activism. LCMS conservatives routinely attacked moderates for supporting cooperation with more liberal Lutherans. Indeed, LCMS leaders before 1969 were increasingly attached to liberal Protestantism and progressive activism in general. Yet Otten and his peers were part of a conservative movement that was no less ecumenical in nature.

Despite the barriers to entry inherent in any denominational history, scholars of recent American religion and the culture wars will find this book to be useful for two main reasons. First, as Burkee suggests, his book expands the Christian Right beyond the usual Sunbelt suspects. Second, the LCMS story counters the standard narrative of unambiguous conservative ascendance. Nearly three million strong by 1972, the LCMS has since lost more than 500,000 members amid persistent feuding within its overwhelmingly conservative leadership. Not all conservative churches were growing during the evangelical resurgence.

STEVEN P. MILLER
Webster University

DANIEL K. WILLIAMS. God's Own Party: The Making of the Christian Right. New York: Oxford University Press. 2010. Pp. viii, 372. $29.95.

What is commonly known as the "Religious Right" has never existed as a singularly coherent, united political front. Competing factions, personalities, and agendas have long worked against such unity, but that lack of organizational oneness has not prevented conservative Christians from influencing local, state, and national politics. Nor have these factions prevented conservative Christians from becoming a dominant force—some might say the dominant force—within the Republican Party. Understanding and explaining how these competing factions and personalities worked to reshape the character and agenda of the GOP is the central objective of Daniel K. Williams's new book. Williams successfully meets that objective, thanks to his exhaustively researched, elegantly written, and thoroughly accessible national study of the "making of the Christian Right." The result is a book that broadens and complicates the narrative of Christian political influence in the twentieth century (and beyond) while contributing to the ever growing literature on the temporal, thematic, and motivational geneses of modern American conservatism.

Readers expecting heavy doses of Jerry Falwell, Pat Robertson, and James Dobson will not be surprised to find their expectations met. These three political figures played critical, though sometimes conflicting roles in shaping conservative reactions to social, cultural, and economic changes from the 1970s through the early twenty-first century. The same readers will also not be surprised by the rich, detailed narrative of social conservative activism during the 1970s and 1980s, much of it connected to issues like school prayer, abortion, homosexuality, and feminism. Certainly, these were the years and the issues that most observers identify as the originating locus of the modern Christian Right, and Williams spends ample time on these matters. Yet, Williams also reminds us that evangelicals "gained prominence during Ronald Reagan's [1980] campaign not because they were speaking out on political issues—they had been doing this for decades—but because they were taking over the Republican Party. It was an event more than fifty years in the making" (p. 2).

This longer, national narrative is one of the book's key contributions. Williams devotes space to crucial moments like the 1924 Democratic National Convention, which split over Prohibition. Then rather suddenly, economic depression reshaped the nation's political discourse, while fundamentalist Christians temporarily receded into isolation. No longer leading the culture wars of the 1920s, many turned to premillennial dispensationalism, a theological school particularly noteworthy for an eschatology (end-times doctrine) that taught believers to anticipate heightened corruption and chaos as indicators of Christ's imminent return. This had the short-term effect of steering many fundamentalist Christians toward prophetic speculation and away from politics. That shift was redirected once again with the birth of the National Association of Evangelicals (NAE) in 1942. Quickly, the NAE flexed its political muscles and lobbied for broadcasting laws that were more sympathetic to evangelical preachers and radio hosts. As Williams traces the activity of the NAE through the next several decades, he simultaneously weaves state and local examples into a wider national narrative that stresses the importance of and impetus for change within the Republican Party.

Williams offers another contribution by trying to make terms like "fundamentalist" and "evangelical" less slippery and also less popularly synonymous. He not only notes that these terms carried distinctly different traits as far as theological priorities and political agendas were concerned, but also highlights the degree to which politically aware Christians sought to brand themselves as one or the other. More specifically, Williams shows how many Christian leaders, for public relations reasons, rejected the term "fundamentalism"—which was technically a simple belief in biblical literalism and inerrancy—in favor of "evangelical," which connoted, for many, moderation and reason. At the same time, self-identified (and typically shrill) fundamentalists like John R. Rice, Bob Jones, Carl McIntire, Billy James Hargis, and Jerry Falwell embraced the fundamentalist term while criticizing evangelicals who, during much of the 1950s, were less politically vocal and often willing to work with non-southern churches in support of civil rights and racial integration. As Williams further explores the rise of evangelicals like Billy Graham and Bill Bright, he simultaneously explains why fundamentalists were increasingly marginalized by their own uncompromising, conspiracy laden, and racialized brand of anticommunism. Along the way, Williams builds a convincing, if possibly overstated, case that modern conservatism has been shaped by religion more than by any other factor.

Ultimately, this book tells a story with which all political historians should be familiar. The narrative is well-paced, richly detailed, and relatively balanced. Williams also deserves credit for emphasizing the life and work of Francis Schaeffer, whose influence among evangelical Christians—particularly (but by no means exclusively) on the issue of abortion—has been vastly underestimated by most historians. It is tempting to write still more about this deft study. Suffice it to say that this book, along with Darren Dochuk's From Bible Belt to Sunbelt: Plain-Folk Religion, Grassroots Politics, and the Rise of Evangelical Conservatism (2011), has done much to advance scholarly understanding of the dynamics between Christianity and conservative American politics.

SEAN P. CUNNINGHAM
Texas Tech University

SEAN P. CUNNINGHAM. Cowboy Conservatism: Texas and the Rise of the Modern Right. (New Directions in Southern History.) Lexington: University Press of Kentucky. 2010. Pp. xvi, 293. $40.00.

In recent years, the field of American political history has enjoyed an outpouring of new work on postwar conservative politics. The results have run the gamut from the brilliant to the pedestrian. Sean P. Cunningham's Cowboy Conservatism lands squarely in the latter category. Marred by a weak and unsupported argument, superficial secondary research, and wearying factual and interpretative errors, the book fails to advance our understanding of the modern Right or even Texas politics in any meaningful way.

The primary flaw is foundational. At its heart, this is not a book about conservatism or even conservatives; instead it seems like a reverse-engineered examination of the emergence of the modern GOP in Texas. Despite the title's promise, Cunningham neither explains "cowboy conservatism" nor Texas's role in the "rise of the Right." In fact, he does not seem very interested in the conservatives who built the party, or voters, or, with only a few exceptions, even politicians. In their stead, we, often in the passive voice, have nonspecific "Texans" (frequently without regard to racial, ethnic, or regional distinction) embracing the GOP because they had come to appreciate a "look"—the image of a conservative philosophy" (p. 5). At its heart, that is the argument of the book—unnamed "state and national conservatives" used cleverly packaged catch phrases to "build a viable and ultimately dominant Texas Republican Party." So, rather than real human actors forming alliances, hustling for votes, or tending to the countless tasks of building a movement, Cunningham writes: "Texas politics . . . was defined by public perceptions that were shaped by the purposeful use of specific images and icons that, collectively, transformed the state's political culture and led to partisan realignment" (p. 4). The book, as they might say in Texas, is all hat and no cattle.

A secondary argument anchors the first half of the book. It goes something like this: the assassination of President John F. Kennedy in Dallas, initially thought by many to be the work of right-wing extremists, dealt a massive blow to the Texas Right that forced "extremism" into retreat. This, he explains, is one of the reasons that Lyndon Johnson defeated Barry Goldwater so easily in Texas. I can't imagine why we might need an alternative argument for Johnson's victory. It seems that the native son incumbent who had spent his career shoveling truckloads of federal cash into the pockets of both the rich and poor in Texas going up against one of the most embarrassingly weak national candidates of modern times might just be all the explanation needed. In fact, one might make the argument that when one considers the major down ticket election, the U.S. Senate race between George H. W. Bush and Ralph Yarborough (which Cunningham does not), the "extremists" did pretty well. Bush, running on a right-wing platform that Cunningham admits later made him sound like a "Bircher" (p. 72) polled eighteen percent higher than Goldwater. Bush, who lost, still won more Texas Republican votes than any other candidate in state history, including John Tower in his two prior Senate races and presidential candidates Dwight D. Eisenhower and Richard Nixon. Curiously, Cunningham only mentions that Bush outpolled Goldwater by "100,000 votes" (it was 176,771) and fails to examine this milestone in Texas GOP history.

Perhaps that is no surprise; throughout the book Cunningham ignores crucial moments in Texas history and important books in its historiography. Which is all the more strange when one considers that next to high school football, politics is the state's favorite blood sport. For example, despite his dependence on "populism" to help craft his argument, he offers no critical analysis of the movement in Texas nor of the work of Lawrence Goodwyn and Roscoe Martin. And when explaining the conflicts of the 1960s he fails to mention to work of Doug Rossinow, Ignacio Garcia, and Amilcar Shabazz, among others. Texas historians will spot many other gaps in the historiography.

Historians of conservatism will be equally disappointed; after two pro forma paragraphs in the book's introduction, Cunningham largely ignores important contributions except when he wants to use a particular phrase like "law and order" or "plain-folks Americanism." While certain texts are sprinkled through the footnotes, most of the time he simply cites the book and too often even neglects to include page numbers. Nowhere in the footnotes or the introduction is there a sustained attempt to explain how this study fits into existing debates over the origins, impacts, or importance of the rise of the Right.

Lastly, the book suffers from a number of simple mistakes that are largely the result of Cunningham's tendency to argue by assertion. Here is an all-too-typical example. When explaining the "ineptitude of Goldwater's strategists," Cunningham states that Goldwater "avoided Dallas and West Texas, areas arguably the most tightly connected to the western populist-conservative ideals he championed" (p. 64). But Goldwater did not avoid Dallas, nor did he avoid West Texas. On September 22, he campaigned in Odessa and Amarillo (where school had been called off in honor of the event) and the next day he gave a major foreign policy address to the American Legion in Dallas. Goldwater returned to West Texas seventeen days later and held huge rallies in Lubbock and El Paso.

The conservative movement in Texas was and is important to postwar American political culture. It certainly deserves a better treatment than this poorly researched, weakly argued, conservatism-as-catch-phrase effort.

JEFF ROCHE
College of Wooster

GREGORY A. DADDIS. No Sure Victory: Measuring U.S. Army Effectiveness and Progress in the Vietnam War. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. xiv, 334. $34.95.

We all know, of course, why the United States lost the war in Vietnam. After soundly defeating the enemy's ill-fated Tet Offensive in 1968, the American military was denied victory by a biased, liberal press that turned the American public against the war and destroyed the political will of the country's civilian leadership. Or was it the pursuit of a flawed strategy of conventional warfare, seeking in vain to kill so many of the enemy that they would sue for peace, while ignoring the importance of winning the hearts and minds of the South Vietnamese people by insuring their safety and prosperity? Or perhaps the war was "unwinnable" from the outset, given a corrupt and inefficient South Vietnamese government and army that could never win the support of their own people, let alone protect them.

Gregory A. Daddis, an army colonel and history professor at the U.S. Army Military Academy, would no doubt concede that an element of truth exists in these and other explanations as to why the United States lost in Vietnam, but he would be quick to add, as he does in his convincingly argued book, that we may never know the exact reasons for failure because the United States never succeeded in developing a reliable system for measuring success in the first place: what worked, what did not, and why? As Daddis notes in his conclusion, there are obvious parallels to America's current conflicts.

Focusing primarily on the U.S. Army, Daddis shows that failure to develop a system for measuring progress was not from lack of trying. During the entire period of the army's involvement in Vietnam, from the advisory efforts in the early 1960s to the commitment of major ground forces in 1965 through the withdrawal of U.S. forces by 1973, the army made a concerted effort to collect data on the prosecution of the war. This effort was championed by Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara and his computer-savvy, "whiz-kid" advisors, steeped in systems analysis techniques and believing that all problems could be quantified and thus resolved. From the outset, McNamara pushed the army to develop metrics for measuring and reporting progress in the war.

What resulted was a massive reporting system, from the lowest level commanders and advisors through channels to Headquarters Military Assistance Command Vietnam (MACV). Daddis discusses the myriad reports and what they attempted to measure, but his account is no mere compilation of statistics. He examines the often vague and conflicting goals toward which the reporting system was directed, the role of senior MACV leadership in establishing those goals and metrics, and how that reporting system not only failed to measure progress but even proved to be counterproductive.

Perhaps most significant, the reporting system failed to measure what was most important in winning a counterinsurgency campaign. Daddis explains that the U.S. Army had an established counterinsurgency doctrine with which American officers were conversant, but that doctrine did not, arguably could not, provide the metrics for measuring progress in a specific case such as Vietnam. Besides, what needed measuring were complex political, economic, and cultural intangibles that did not easily lend themselves to quantification. The MACV staff fell back instead on conventional military yardsticks of progress, notably the ratio of friendly to enemy casualties—the infamous "body count," although Daddis emphasizes that the reporting system included far more data than just casualty statistics.

This reporting system was more than seriously flawed; it actually proved counterproductive in critical ways. The collection, collation, and presentation of the vast amount of data proved an overwhelming task, and therefore little time and effort went to analyzing what that data meant beyond the raw numbers. Thus the information flow was one way. Commanders and advisors in the field who struggled to provide the reports got little in return. Furthermore, the system contained no verification process. Pressure from higher headquarters for progress inevitably led to skewed reporting, such as inflated counts of the number of enemy soldiers killed or villages secured from enemy control, resulting in an overly optimistic assessment of progress at MACV headquarters. Such optimistic assessments could come crashing down, as occurred during the enemy's 1968 Tet Offensive.

This readable account addresses a largely ignored but important aspect of the Vietnam War. Daddis's research is excellent and his supporting citations extensive. His inclusion of soldier and junior leader accounts adds the needed human dimension, showing the frustration of pursuing often vague goals with no clear indication of success while paying the price in blood. I highly recommend this book to soldiers, scholars, and the general reader who wants to understand why, to this day, there is no clear consensus as to exactly how or why we failed in Vietnam.

PETER S. KINDSVATTER
Independent Scholar

LOUISE BARNETT. Atrocity and American Military Justice in Southeast Asia: Trial by Army. (Routledge Studies in the Modern History of Asia, number 64.) New York: Routledge. 2010. Pp. xiii, 278. $130.00.

This is a painful but necessary read. Based on archives and published documents from judicial inquiries, Senate hearings, and military court trials, the author brings out in excruciating detail some of the atrocities perpetrated by American soldiers in the Philippines (1899–1902), Japanese defenders of Manila (1945), and American GIs in Vietnam (1968–1969). Louise Barnett also mentions recent incidents in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Barnett emphasizes continuity rather than change. She sees a pattern of atrocious behavior that repeats itself whenever three conditions are met. First, the military institution forms a culture of its own based on hierarchical loyalty and horizontal solidarity among soldiers with a shared combat experience. Internal loyalties become more important than externally imposed humanitarian principles. Second, the soldiers operate in a foreign country with a culture and language different from their own. They find it difficult to distinguish between enemies and friends, and thus have a tendency to fear and loath the whole population as “gugs” or “gooks.” Third, commanders do not take seriously their obligation to make subordinates observe jus in bello; officers give ambiguous orders or do not have sufficient control of their subordinates.

Because these three conditions have been met in many of America’s wars, atrocities have become almost inevitable. So too has the tendency for the military hierarchy to cover up whenever there is a risk that atrocities may be disclosed, and to ensure minimal punishment for as few as possible of the perpetrators. Barnett’s account is full of pitiful, mediocre men, some of whom have made illustrious military careers in spite of having tortured or executed prisoners, women, and children in the places where they served. Barnett heaps scorn on these men by citing and analyzing the many ways they tried to avoid responsibility and cover their backs when testifying before a tribunal.

The two main villains in the account are Edwin Forbes Glenn (1857–1926) and Douglas MacArthur (1880–1964). The only real hero of the story is MacArthur’s nemesis, Tomoyuki Yamashita (1885–1946), whom Barnett describes with utmost respect. Yamashita was given command of the Japanese forces in the Philippines in October 1944, just before MacArthur’s landing in Leyte, too late and with too few means of transportation to organize an effective defense. He tried to spare the population of Manila by ordering its evacuation, but MacArthur did not leave any exit route open. A Japanese naval commander decided to defy Yamashita’s orders and defend Manila to the end. Knowing they would soon die, the Japanese soldiers committed heinous crimes against the local population, who were caught between the entrenched Japanese and the approaching U.S. military. Some 100,000 people died. Yamashita did his best to prevent this from happening. Yet, he was considered responsible and quickly sentenced to death by an American military commission, and hanged in February 1946. If the “Yamashita standard” had been applied to the U.S. Army itself, then American commanders would also have hanged. Responsibility for My Lai would have been placed not only on the shoulders of William Calley but also on those who instituted the body count as a measure of military success.

Barnett is deeply knowledgeable about the material in the book. She has used a wealth of archival and published sources. Yet, in a strict sense this is not a historical account, but rather a comparative analysis of military justice in three different circumstances. The emphasis is not on the historical circumstances but on patterns repeating themselves. Much is made of the similarity between the war in the Philippines and the Vietnam War. One obviously significant common factor is mostly overlooked: guerrilla tactics. Most of the atrocities described were made in direct response to attacks by forces who did not wear uniforms. The combatants hid among the local population and relied on its support. The atrocities described in the Philippines happened in response to a surprise attack by guerrillas at Balangiga that killed a number of U.S. soldiers while they were having their breakfast. The Japanese troops in the Philippines also faced guerrillas. My Lai happened in the aftermath of the Tet offensive. Guerrillas aim to prevent any bonding between foreign occupants and locals. The surest way to realize this aim is to provoke the foreigners in ways that lead them to commit atrocities. Similarly, the surest way for an army of occupation to undermine its mission and reputation is to allow atrocities to happen. This is what Barnett calls “the McKinley doctrine,” with reference to the president’s speech about the Philippines on December 21, 1898. Although it has been systematically violated since then, the doctrine still holds.

Barnett’s study should be required reading at every military academy.

STEIN TØNNESSEN
Uppsala University

DAVID ZIERLER. The Invention of Ecocide: Agent Orange, Vietnam, and the Scientists Who Changed the Way We Think about the Environment. Athens: University of Georgia Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 245. Cloth $59.95, paper $24.95.

In this book, David Zierler explores the important, underresearched history of American use of chemical defoliants during the Vietnam War and scientists' protests against it. Zierler reveals how the United States' massive, unprecedented military use of herbicides intersects with and illuminates the general histories of the Cold War, postwar environmentalism, and international law and treaties along with the Vietnam War itself.

After a brief introductory chapter surveying history and historiography relating to Agent Orange (the primary defoliant used in Vietnam), Zierler offers chapters on the origins of the ecocide concept; the pre-Vietnam discovery, development, and use of chemical herbicides; the Kennedy administration's policies regarding conventional forces and counterinsurgency tactics to deter communist expansion, and the assumption that chemical defoliation offered a cheap, easy way to help defend South Vietnam from communist insurgents; the evolution of herbicidal warfare in Vietnam—"Operation Ranch Hand"—from its initial introduction in 1961–1963 through its massive expansion from 1964–1968 along with President Lyndon Johnson's Americanization of the war; the origins of scientists' general environmentalist and ecological concerns in postwar America, and the focusing of those concerns on herbicidal warfare; activist scientists' efforts to access information on Ranch Hand and survey actual sprayed zones in Vietnam, and the U.S. government and military's determination to prevent such access; and how activist scientists turned President Richard Nixon's international public relations gambit—belatedly ratifying the 1925 Geneva Protocol on chemical and biological warfare—against him by persuading domestic senators and foreign officials that herbicidal warfare violated the spirit of the Geneva Protocol, culminating in the United States renouncing herbicidal warfare.

Zierler's useful, interesting book contributes to various fields even beyond those listed above. In showing the postwar enthusiasm and exaggerated expectations for new chemical herbicides—much like that surrounding "the Peaceful Atom"—and the Kennedy administration's hope to use herbicide technology to win a war cheaply and easily, Zierler offers a classic vignette for the history of technology. His details regarding production statistics for herbicides, and the cooperation of Dow Chemical with its military and governmental partners to suppress negative information about Agent Orange from the 1960s onward, address business history. He powerfully illuminates the history of science, scientific professionalism, and the politics of science. Zierler's book also touches on many topics in passing and offers a wealth of interesting insights and unexpected connections. For instance, it is fascinating to learn that much of the concern over defoliation was driven by worries about human population growth, a key environmental issue later forgotten by governments and environmentalists alike, or that George F. Kennan, the early Cold War architect of containment doctrine, in 1970 "identified impending ecological doom as the pre-eminent security threat facing humankind" (p. 29).

The book's strength is also its main weakness. It would be a herculean task fully to address all the issues the book raises—particularly in a slender volume. Predictably, Zierler sometimes fails. The book overall, especially in certain chapters, has a breathless feel, jumping from topic to topic, barely touching one before moving on. Zierler sometimes writes for the cognoscenti rather than a more general readership. It helps if the reader already has significant background in the Cold War, postwar environmentalism, postwar technology, ecology, and international law, because some matters receive little explanation and might bewilder general historians of the twentieth-century United States, let alone other historians, graduate students, and, especially, undergraduates. This is particularly evident in the second chapter, on ecocide, which briefly mentions Bertrand Russell, Jean-Paul Sartre, the Nuremberg War Trials, Noam Chomsky, George F. Kennan, and Jared Diamond within the space of a few pages and paragraphs—before readers have any context regarding defoliation in Vietnam. The breathless feel is exacerbated by various avoidable editing errors.

Zierler labels the anti-defoliation scientists non-environmentalists, dutifully citing William Cronon in pointing out that they never envisioned a pristine Eden; but Cronon's critique of environmentalism never applied well to urban, anti-pollution, or anti-toxic environmentalism, which clearly predominated in America around 1970. Zierler acknowledges that Barry Commoner, definitely an environmentalist, blazed the trail on the defoliation issue as on atmospheric testing, and that the anti-defoliation scientists' successful campaign to prohibit herbicidal warfare under the Geneva Protocol depended on the swelling strength of broader antiwar and environmental movements. Moreover, biologist Arthur Galston's 2007 statement disclaiming environmentalism and disparaging environmentalists—with possibly self-serving hindsight (p. 18)—does not square with his intensely, classically environmentalist rhetoric before the Senate in 1970 (p. 154). Zierler somewhat mischaracterizes Rachel Carson's Silent Spring (1962) as being just about DDT and the American environment, when Carson addressed all chemical pesticides and spoke universally enough that her book was translated into thirty-one foreign languages. Nevertheless, Zierler's study should prove interesting, important, and thought-provoking for readers from a wide range of scholarly backgrounds.

SCOTT HAMILTON DEWEY
University of California Law Library,
Los Angeles

CHIA YOUYEE VANG. Hmong America: Reconstructing Community in Diaspora. (The Asian American Experience.) Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press. 2010. Pp. xxii, 200. Cloth $75.00, paper $25.00.

Chia Youyee Vang takes up the question, "How do refugees build an ethnic community from scratch . . . when they arrive with almost no material resources but a long history of nation-building aspirations in their homeland?" The resulting book is a valuable addition to the study of U.S. migration and Asian American history. Through her focus on people who entered the United States as "refugees" rather than "immigrants," Vang provides a case study of an increasingly visible—albeit politically and administratively fraught—category of newcomers in America. That Hmong Americans have received little attention from Asian American historians (they are eclipsed in the scholarship on Southeast Asians by studies of Vietnamese and Cambodians) makes the book an especially welcome contribution.

Framed by her interest in the connections between homeland memories and practices with community building and changing identities in the United States, Vang's study begins in Asia and reviews the history of the Hmong and U.S. involvement in Laos during the Vietnam War. Although this is not the first study to link the expansion of American global power to U.S. immigration, the book establishes the history of Hmong Americans as an especially clear-cut case of U.S. militarism begetting the migration of displaced people across American borders. Since the early 1960s, the Central Intelligence Agency had organized members of minority groups in Laos into guerrilla units to fight a "secret war" against Vietnamese and Lao communists. Resulting in rural displacement and dependency on American forces, this intervention also gave rise to a refugee crisis following the U.S. withdrawal in 1973 and the rise of the Pathet Lao in 1975.

Describing the status and journey of a "stateless people" whose histories have been marked by wartime trauma and humanitarian sympathy, this monograph makes worthwhile contributions to the study of refugees in America generally and the Indochinese specifically. Vang, however, is chiefly concerned with portraying the distinctiveness of Hmong America. In addition to underscoring the unique circumstances prompting Hmong migration, she details how Hmong set themselves apart. For instance, ethnic leaders invoked their loyalty to Americans during the "secret war" to build social and political capital, pursue electoral politics, and work to secure passage of the Hmong Veterans' Naturalization Act of 2000, which exempted certain refugees from English-language and civics requirements in the naturalization process.

While Vang introduces the book as a study about refugees, she resists portraying her subjects as objects of pity and charity, emphasizing instead their agency and adaptability. Showing how Hmong Americans have utilized "both existing Hmong social-organization strategies and new resources available to them in the host country" (p. 2), Vang's approach is informed by recent directions in U.S. immigration history that attend to factors in the host and home countries to understand the newcomers' settlement and adjustment patterns. Her major topics of analysis—kinship networks, mutual aid organizations, churches, traditions, gender roles, and homeland politics—tread familiar territory in U.S. immigration studies and suggest that, while Hmong arrived in the United States under unique circumstances, they can also be regarded as another group in a "nation of immigrants."

The book's strengths lie in its sketches of Hmong American organizational life in locations off the beaten track in Asian America, such as St. Paul, Minnesota; Wausau, Wisconsin; and Mohnton, Pennsylvania. Vang introduces us to organizations like the Association for the Advancement of Hmong Women in Minnesota and offers engaging discussions of beauty pageants, New Year celebrations, and Christian churches. She also shows these were highly organized, tightly knit communities that placed a premium on maintaining "Hmongness"—which she stresses is dynamic and flexible—while responding to the challenges of growth and fragmentation.

In using historical and sociological approaches, Vang shows versatility and broadens the book's utility across disciplines. At times, however, her focus on community building and internal politics causes the historical backdrop—so integral to the first portion of the book—to fall away, and she misses an opportunity to contextualize the Hmong American experience against developments in late twentieth-century America. Additionally, due to Vang's emphasis on ethnic institutions, the dominant perspectives in the book are those of community leaders and academics, and we hear little from ordinary Hmong. Finally, this reviewer wished Vang had brought a stronger interpretive voice to her materials. For example, in a discussion of a 2007 controversy over the selection of a China-born contestant for the title of Miss Hmong America in Minneapolis, she states, "Permitting a non-Hmong American to represent Hmong Americans seems to discredit [pageant organizers'] previous emphasis on Hmong Americanness. Some may interpret this as a sign that culture is fluid; however, such practice could be viewed as this group placing higher value on ethnic affiliation than American citizenship" (p. 121). Much of her analysis proceeds in this manner, leaving the reader unsure of the takeaway.

Such comments aside, this is an important and needed book that advances Hmong American studies, Asian American studies, and refugee studies.

SHELLEY S. LEE
Oberlin College

BETH BAILEY. America's Army: Making the All-Volunteer Force. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press. 2009. Pp. xi, 319. $29.95.

In this book, Beth Bailey examines the origins and development of the post-Vietnam all-volunteer force (AVF). It is no easy task to write the history of an institution as large, complicated, and contested as the United States Army, but Bailey has done so with intelligence, grace, and wit.

The patently unfair Selective Service System of the Vietnam War era made the AVF possible. Bailey shows how libertarian thinkers in the Nixon administration, rather than respond to criticisms that the draft forced minorities and the poor to serve in disproportionate numbers by mandating a system of equal sacrifice, emphasized the importance of liberty over equality, individual freedom over citizenship. Moreover, Richard Nixon believed that the military should have to compete for its employees by offering better pay and benefits. As such, the administration aimed “to replace the logic of citizenship with the logic of the market” (p. 4). Here Bailey does well to recover the history of a long succession of commissions and task forces in a way that holds readers’ interest by situating it among broader trends in American life.

The new all-volunteer force could not divorce itself from the times, and whether policymakers liked it or not, they had to engage questions of equality—not of equal sacrifice, but of equal opportunity. As unemployment soared in the mid-1970s, civil rights advocates pushed the army to provide equal access for African American men, even as others claimed that the army’s recruitment of a disproportionate number of black men in the AVF’s early years—thirty percent in 1974—contributed to the army’s decline in “quality.”

Although the army’s advertising campaigns strove to “portray an Army that young men might want to join” (p. 45) and stressed that the army was “not about obligation, but about opportunity” (p. 87)—ads emphasized skills training and travel to exotic destinations, featuring beautiful women—by 1980 the market approach seemed to be failing. Dreamy promises of travel went unfulfilled as recruits experienced the cold reality of training to fight and kill; low morale, increased AWOL and desertion rates, widespread drug and alcohol abuse, and a surge in crime marked the army experience. It looked like the AVF experiment had failed. Against the backdrop of Americans held hostage in Iran and the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, the U.S. military seemed weak and unprepared. Because “no one expected to fight a war with a volunteer force” (p. 128), President Jimmy Carter reintroduced draft registration.

Bringing back draft registration extended the inclusion dilemma more directly to women at a time when grassroots battles raged over the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA). When Congress pushed the army to shut down the Women’s Army Corps (WACs) and to open the military academies to women, the army prepared for the “inevitable” imposition of more women into its ranks. But the idea that the amendment might, if ratified, mandate that women be drafted soon became central to the debates over the ERA and led to its defeat.

Army recruiting turned around in the 1980s thanks in part to an embrace of research and systems analysis, another recession, and growing distance from the Vietnam War. The memorable “Be All You Can Be” advertising campaign—which offered a “road to college” that included up to $50,000 for education—finally put the AVF on solid footing. But then the Cold War ended, prompting calls to scale back military spending.

Just as the nation went through a recession during which “downsizing” became a household term, the army began downsizing too, cutting loose even those who planned on long military careers. In the last two decades the army has continued to reinvent its image: first, in the 1990s, as a force for good, which offered equal opportunity, education, training, and produced upright citizens and employees; second, by the time the United States went to war in Iraq in 2003, as a trainer of highly skilled warriors.

Although the army, like most Americans, seems to have let go of the idea that military service should be an obligation of citizenship, Bailey ends with only a brief challenge for readers to consider the implications of so few doing the nation’s fighting. Here one wishes Bailey had explored the cultural (and moral) implications of manpower mobilization in more depth. The AVF makes it easier for the United States to go to war, she notes, because the overwhelming majority of citizens can go about their lives totally untouched by its horrors. What does that tell us about the state of American militarism and nationalism? Further, Bailey could have dwelled at more length on what this brand of militarism says about American masculinity, family values, and the actual experience of serving in America’s Army. To be fair, such questions may require book-length answers and should not, therefore, detract from Bailey’s impressive achievement.

MICHAEL S. FOLEY
University of Sheffield

GRETA R. KRIPPNER. Capitalizing on Crisis: The Political Origins of the Rise of Finance. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 2011. Pp. xv, 222. $39.95.

Since it burst onto the streets in September 2011, the Occupy Wall Street movement has drawn attention to the way in which thirty years of corporate and federal policies have funneled the fruits of economic growth to the wealthiest while the income of “the ninety-nine percent” stagnated and their indebtedness exploded. How did this happen?

In this essential book, Greta R. Krippner identifies financialization—“the growing importance of financial activities as a source of profits in the economy”—as a prime culprit (p. 27). Beginning in the 1970s, U.S. financial institutions shifted away from funding the production of goods and services toward activities such as consumer lending and trading securities and derivatives. Meanwhile, non-financial corporations increasingly shied away from long-term fixed investments in plant, equipment, and research and development. Instead, they too diverted funds into finance. The result was a surge in investors’ returns, an explosion in the compensation of financiers and stock-incentivized corporate CEOs, and a far more volatile economy periodically besieged by financial crisis.

Krippner begins with simple yet powerful quantitative analysis. While in the 1950s and 1960s, financial sector profits ranged between ten and fifteen percent of total profits, they have accounted for roughly thirty percent of profits since 1980, peaking above forty percent in 2001. While the manufacturing and service sectors exchanged positions as the leading employer during the 1980s, the percentage of the workforce employed in FIRE (financial, insurance, real estate) never has exceeded seven percent of the workforce in the postwar period, even as that sector gobbled up an ever-increasing share of profits. Among non-financial corporations, portfolio income (earnings from interest, dividends, and realized capital gains) shot up beginning in the 1970s, approaching fifty percent of non-financial corporate cash flow in 2000 (p. 36). In other words, firms like Ford and General Electric generated more profits from the interest they earned from lending to customers or engaging in financial trading than they did from the sale of products.

Why did the turn to finance occur? State policy played a pivotal role, Krippner argues, although “financialization was not a deliberate outcome sought by policymakers” (p. 58). Her nuanced account understands financialization as the “inadvertent result of policymakers’ attempts to extricate themselves from a series of political dilemmas” resulting from the eruption of inflation in the late 1960s and 1970s (p. 27). With inflation and then stagnation, policymakers confronted difficult choices about the distribution of limited resources. As inflation became endemic in the 1970s, the savings of small savers lost value in real terms, for Regulation Q of the 1933 Banking Act limited the rate of interest FDIC-insured banks could pay to depositors. Many could not qualify for new, higher-paying instruments that banks designed to allow large investors to evade Regulation Q. At the same time, the interest charged on loans to acquire essential components of the American dream (like cars, consumer durables, and houses) climbed.

With the Depository Institutions Deregulation and Monetary Control Act of 1980 and decisions to remove barriers to foreign investment, Krippner explains, policymakers of both parties relieved themselves of the increasingly “unpalatable task” of allocating credit through direct regulation. Fluctuating interest rates now determined access to credit. Over the next three decades, Americans willingly paid higher interest rates and borrowed more than anyone imagined. So did their federal government. Under President Ronald Reagan, deficits exploded due to steep tax cuts and increased military spending.

The market failed to curb demand because when interest rates rose, they attracted capital from both financial and non-financial corporations across the globe. Credit never became prohibitively expensive. As capital flowed toward U.S. borrowers and “increasingly speculative” financial activities, asset prices soared. Successive financial bubbles, Krippner instructs, represented inflation transferred “from the nonfinancial to the financial economy—where it was not visible (or conceptualized) as such” (p. 103).

In the aftermath of financial deregulation, monetary policy became policymakers’ only remaining tool. Alan Greenspan committed the Federal Reserve to maintaining low interest rates in order to buoy asset prices in the 1990s and 2000s. But all that cheap and plentiful credit inflated first the dot-com and then the subprime bubbles. True, many Americans witnessed their wealth multiply (at least on paper) as stocks surged and housing boomed. But these bubbles also encouraged them to spend—and to borrow—even more to make up for their stagnant wages. Beginning in 2007, trillions of dollars invested in homes, securities, and derivatives evaporated, but individuals and institutions still owe the money they borrowed to acquire those assets.

Krippner’s brilliant book reveals that the United States never resolved the fundamental question of the 1970s: what does a just economic distribution look like? Financialization merely papered over it with debt.

Will economic recovery require that we turn back from finance? Americans may face no more urgent question. This book provides an essential historical background for those who dare to pose it.

JULIA C. OTT
The New School

ANDREW L. YARROW. Measuring America: How Economic Growth Came to Define American Greatness in the Late Twentieth Century. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press. 2010. Pp. x, 240. Cloth $80.00, paper $26.95.

Over the last two decades, historians such as Alan Brinkley, Elizabeth Cohen, and Robert Collins have documented how economic growth and rising standards of living became the centerpiece of American political economy after World War II. Both the political Right and Left made growth the focus of their policy prescriptions even as they fought over how to pursue that economic expansion and how to share its benefits. Andrew L. Yarrow links this more familiar policy story to cultural history, showing how economic growth became the sign and gauge of American “greatness,” supplanting older political ideals such as liberty or equality.

While acknowledging that the United States has long been associated with images of material abundance, Yarrow argues that discussions of growth in the postwar era had a significantly different character. Instead of being grounded in broad, general visions of rich natural resources or Yankee ingenuity, postwar growth was explicitly defined, quantified, and tracked through new economic statistics such as Gross Domestic Product (GDP). Moreover, the celebration of growth was tied to a dramatic rise in the cultural prestige and political power of American economists who (so it seemed) had the power to predict and direct its future course. The cultural narratives of abundance in the postwar era were thus suffused with a relatively novel form of discourse (national income accounting) and a newly prominent set of experts (economists).

Yarrow’s account proceeds topically rather than chronologically, examining the emphasis on economic growth in various domains. He begins by describing how the pursuit of growth became a dominant focus for American economists in the middle of the twentieth century, anchored by national income accounting techniques that were developed during the interwar period. Yarrow then highlights the centrality of growth to postwar American political debates and the salient role of economists, most notably through the Council of Economic Advisers (CEA, established as part of the Employment Act of 1946). Much of this narrative covers familiar territory, but Yarrow is keen to emphasize the public face of policy history: how postwar American presidents increasingly used economic statistics to define the success of their administrations and how CEA economists became minor political celebrities, pushing the mantra of growth in congressional testimony, press releases, articles, and speeches.

These changes in political discourse were aided and reflected in other arenas. Yarrow describes the promotion of a "people's capitalism" by various business groups—ranging from the conservative National Association of Manufacturers to the center-left Committee for Economic Development—which, despite their differences, placed rising productivity and economic growth at the center of American identity as a liberal capitalist nation. In this vision, American economic expansion demonstrated the superiority of capitalism and its benefits to American workers, who would share in rising living standards and new technologies. (Surprisingly, though, Yarrow gives little attention to how labor unions championed a similar narrative.) Likewise, growth became, in Yarrow's terms, the "big postwar story" for American journalism through the early 1960s, as newspapers and magazines revamped their content to make economic and business reporting a prominent feature, complete with lavish charts, graphs, and tables and heroic stories about leading economists. Finally, Yarrow examines the changing depictions of the United States both in American international propaganda and in history textbooks and educational films. This discussion forms Yarrow's most original and striking example, as he shows how educational materials shifted from emphasizing political values to placing free enterprise and industrial productivity at the heart of the American experience.

In Yarrow's view the mid-1960s marked an inflection point in the cultural history of growth as critical voices from both the Right and Left gained new traction in challenging the dominant postwar narratives. The fragile coalition that had supported a loosely Keynesian, growth-centered liberalism fragmented as skeptics on the left dissected the flaws of the postwar consumer society and conservatives attacked government intervention. Meanwhile, persistent poverty and the economic crises of the 1970s undermined public confidence in America's economic might and thwarted expectations that growth would prove a panacea for social and economic ills.

Though Yarrow is largely successful at intertwining policy history with the history of public culture, the book is not without its limitations. Despite Yarrow's title and the significance of economic statistics for his overall thesis, he gives little attention to the creation and calculation of these numbers. In fact, arguments about the proper conceptual basis for national income accounting date back to the very origin of these statistics in the wake of World War II and encompass many of the same issues that would resurface in later critiques. Statistics, far from being simple compilations of unquestionable economic or social facts, are equally a form of cultural discourse, and Yarrow's valuable addition to the history of the postwar United States would be strengthened by historicizing the measurement of "economic growth" itself.

THOMAS A. STAPLEFORD
University of Notre Dame

NICHOLAS EVAN SARANTAKES. Dropping the Torch: Jimmy Carter, the Olympic Boycott, and the Cold War. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. xvi, 340. Cloth $90.00, paper $28.99.

In November 1978, President Jimmy Carter signed into law the Amateur Sports Act, which included recognition of the United States Olympic Committee (USOC) as an independent non-governmental organization (NGO). A little more than a year later, in response to the Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan, Carter announced that the United States would boycott the Olympic Games scheduled to take place in Moscow in the summer of 1980 if the USSR did not halt its invasion and promptly withdraw. "No one in the administration made any effort to contact . . . USOC officials until after the President had determined his policy" (p. 107). Neither the Carter administration nor the USOC made a serious effort to consult the athletes who had trained for years in anticipation of the games. After deciding on a boycott, Carter sent Vice President Walter Mondale to demand that the USOC vote against sending a team to Moscow. The USOC meekly complied. During the Winter Olympics at Lake Placid, New York, Secretary of State Cyrus Vance astonished and infuriated the International Olympic Committee (IOC) by insisting that the United States was determined to boycott the Olympics as a way "to preserve the meaning of the Olympics for years to come" (p. 124). The National Olympic Committees of Great Britain, France, and Italy defied their governments and sent teams to Moscow, but Chancellor Helmut Schmidt buckled under intense pressure from Carter and pressured Germany's National Olympic Committee not to send a team. Schmidt prevailed by a narrow vote. Whether the Moscow Games were a success or failure is still debated. Nicholas Evan Sarantakes concludes, a little too positively, "There is no question that the boycott did damage, but the athletic competitions in Moscow themselves were worthy of their Olympic name . . . No one in Moscow . . . really missed the boycotters" (p. 226).

His narrative history of a weak president's worst moments begins with the chauvinist public response to the unexpected Winter Olympics triumph of the young and inexperienced American ice hockey team and then moves back in time to sketch an outline of the history of the Olympics through the IOC's decision to award the 1980 Olympics to Moscow rather than to Los Angeles. Sarantakes traces the inglorious career of Lord Killanin, the least capable of the IOC's modern presidents. (Killanin's determination to resist Carter's demand for cancellation of the summer games was motivated in part by his awareness that he had failed to avert a number of boycotts before and during the 1976 Montreal Olympics.) Sarantakes examines U.S.-Soviet relations from the perspective of Washington, where an unpopular president, burdened by the Iranian hostage crisis, faced electoral challenges not only from Ronald Reagan but also from Edward Kennedy. In contrast to those who have studied the 1980 boycott controversy mainly from an American perspective, Sarantakes looks into the affair as seen from Moscow, where Leonid Brezhnev, seriously ill with cerebral atherosclerosis, faced considerable opposition to his policy of détente.

The great value of this study is the almost day-by-day account of the Carter administration as it thrashed about in search of an effective nonmilitary way to deal with the USSR's unexpected Afghan intervention. The efforts of Carter's special envoy, Lloyd Cutler, are detailed with less ironic comment than called for by Cutler's abysmal ignorance about the Olympics. Commenting on Cutler's demand that the IOC cancel the Moscow games, Sarantakes observes, mildly, that "it became obvious to Killanin that the American did not know what he was talking about" (p. 114). Sarantakes is similarly restrained in his account of the "fiasco" (p. 117) that resulted when Carter sent Muhammad Ali to Africa to rally support for the boycott. Ali's uninformed public statements did "significant damage to the credibility of his diplomatic mission" (p. 116). In a chapter entitled "Civil Wars," Sarantakes skillfully describes Carter's abortive efforts to persuade Margaret Thatcher and Valéry Giscard d'Estaing to compel from the British and French National Olympic Committees the abject compliance that Carter received from the USOC. He does justice also to Schmidt's dismay at the Carter administration's attitude that NATO allies "should simply do as they were told" (p. 121).

Although the study is focused primarily on the American boycott of the 1980 summer games, there are also rather cursory chapters on the games themselves and on the Soviet bloc's absolutely predictable tit-for-tat boycott of the 1984 summer games in Los Angeles.

The research devoted to the actions and motivations of the Carter administration is excellent. The same cannot be said for the research devoted to foreign sources. On the whole, however, factual errors seem to be few and forgivable. Nineteen photographs with informative captions illustrate the narrative. The English-language bibliography is extensive. There is also a useless epilogue with paragraph-length accounts of the post-1980 careers of the principal actors. Readers interested in whatever happened to Carter, Ali, et al. should look elsewhere.

ALLEN GUTTMANN
Amherst College

JEFFREY CRAIG SANDERS. Seattle and the Roots of Urban Sustainability: Inventing Ecotopia. (History of the Urban Environment.) Pittsburgh, Pa.: University of Pittsburgh Press. 2010. Pp. xiii, 288. $30.00.

What makes Seattle the "Emerald City"? To some the label merely refers to the abundance of evergreen fir trees in the vicinity, and to others it refers to the environmentally sensitive urban population that ranges from skiing, mountain biking, kayaking yuppies to tree-hugging, unshaven, eco-raiding hippie throwbacks. Jeffrey Craig Sanders clearly explicates and defends the proposition that Seattle residents are indeed environmentally sensitive and argues that the postwar environmental movement originated in such grassroots, local, political, and social initiatives as occurred in Seattle after World War II. How Seattle became green is the topic of his book.

The author describes several instances of urban activism and rising environmental awareness, beginning with a description of the effort to preserve Pike Place Market. The market had started as a viable commercial link between the agricultural hinterland and the urban population in the early twentieth century. By the post-World War II period, the market had declined in popularity and usefulness as agricultural areas fell to suburban development and urban residents shifted their shopping habits from specialty shops and stalls to the increasingly ubiquitous grocery stores and shopping centers. The increasingly dilapidated Pike Place became the target of urban renewal and development efforts, but urban activists seeking to preserve and restore the market's value as a Seattle cultural icon, viable commercial center, and tourist attraction thwarted the efforts to tear it down.

Next, the author explains the development of effective neighborhood activism in the Central District of Seattle through the Great Society's Model Cities program. Whereas the Model Cities program faltered and failed in many localities, in Seattle the program developed into a vibrant political organization that trained many young activists who went on to long careers in the city's political life. Another type of activism developed out of the efforts to control the future use of the decommissioned Fort Lawton as urban open space. Native American activists clashed with middle-class Audubon Society members in debates over the appropriate uses of open space, which were finally resolved in a compromise that allowed both groups to control portions of the location.

The last two chapters in the book describe counter-culture activism centered on urban agriculture and community gardens, recycling and urban homesteading with the use of green building and remodeling methods, and outreach and education efforts through newsletters, symposiums, and community center and home-based demonstrations. These counterculture efforts created in Seattle a version of Ecotopia. The book's epilogue chronicles the failure of the 1993 Seattle Commons urban renewal plan. New Urbanism theories in support of small "urban village" dynamics lay at the heart of the plan for the area north of downtown and south of Lake Union. Resistance to the plan arose in the "decaying," low-rent, Cascade neighborhood, which would have been destroyed in the urban renewal plan. Seattle's tradition of neighborhood activism rose up as Cascade residents and other community activists organized efforts to thwart the grandiose Seattle Commons plan. The activists were successful in defeating the proposal (the Cascade neighborhood gained a "historical neighborhood" designation), but they could not stop the process of gentrification that came to the area, raising rents and "repackaging the counterculture urban sensibilities" of Ecotopia (p. 231).

This book takes the small district approach to urban history and urban studies. It looks at particular places, neighborhoods, and locations in Seattle and then mounts a convincing argument that the sum of these particular case studies allows the author to make pronouncements about the city at large, labeling its society and culture as identifiably green. The other approach to urban studies is the metropolitan or big-picture perspective, which gives an overarching view, as if from on high, and tries to identify cities and their people in the aggregate. From this view of Seattle one would see clogged freeways, typical urban sprawl, national sports teams, ferry culture (maritime urban commuters), industrial and postindustrial booms and busts (tied to companies such as Boeing and Microsoft), immigration and emigration patterns, and commercial trade links (Pacific Rim issues). In other words, a book about Seattle that took the metropolitan approach would look very different from this one, not better, just different.

This is a good book. It is well written, well researched, smart, and convincing. Readers will learn a lot about Seattle's history and its identity as an environmentally sensitive place, populated by many eco-friendly people.

MICHAEL F. LOGAN
Oklahoma State University

PHILIP MIROWSKI. Science-Mart: Privatizing American Science. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 2011. Pp. 454. $39.95.

Part history of science, part intellectual history, and part diatribe against all things "neoliberal," Philip Mirowski's study delivers a dizzying kaleidoscope of arguments about scientific and intellectual life in the modern United States and is bound to provoke and stimulate historians of science, higher education, economics, and modern thought. Structured around the curious narrative device of Viridiana Jones, a fictive naïf science professor to whom Mirowski explains the ways of the world, the book argues that since 1980, scientific practice in the United States and around the globe has been profoundly influenced by the economic doctrines Mirowski collectively calls neoliberalism. Encouraged to profit from science, academic and corporate scientists and government policymakers have turned away from the vital work of cultivating a science base and instead chased a false idol of commercialization that has eroded both our economy and our ability to produce knowledge.

Mirowski sets his argument within a historical framework, identifying three distinct regimes of science that have dominated over the past one hundred years. The first regime, which Mirowski labels with a Veblenesque nod the "captains of erudition" regime, began in the 1890s and persisted until World War II. This regime was characterized by the emergence of the modern research laboratory within the corporation. These corporate labs often predated and outperformed university laboratories, and government policy toward science was largely hands off. All this changed with the advent of the Cold War regime, ushered in during World War II and persisting until 1980. Corporations continued to invest in scientific research and development (R&D), benefiting from military contracts. Yet it was the federal government, primarily through military funding and control, that drove science policy and created the academic research scientist. The Cold War regime emphasized the importance of basic science as a force that could defeat the Soviet enemy, showcase the intellectual freedoms of the United States, and result in broad social benefits. Mirowski focuses most of his attention on the third "globalized privatization regime," identifying six trends that highlight the move to privatized science: deindustrialization, the rise of the internet, the strengthening of intellectual property rights, the restructuring and outsourcing of corporate R&D, the withdrawal of the state as science manager and patron, and the state's choice to draw back from providing advanced education (p. 114). Most problematic of all, under the globalized privatization regime the character of scientific inquiry itself was transformed as science became an instrumental route to profit.

Central to Mirowski's indictment of the globalized privatization regime is his attack upon neoliberalism, which he identifies as the economic doctrines of F. A. Hayek, specifically Hayek's contention that the marketplace is the best possible information processor. According to Mirowski, the most consequential feature of this idea is that it collapses the distinction between markets for goods and markets for ideas. The mechanism enabling this collapse, and the place where neoliberal rubber meets the road, is the "fortification" or strengthening of intellectual property rights, a key precursor to the commodification of knowledge and the privatization of science. Mirowski argues that contrary to Hayek, the market can also produce disinformation or ignorance. His case study is the biotech industry, where the post-1980 move away from in-house corporate R&D and academic health centers has led to the rise of subcontractor firms responsive to their paymasters rather than the scrutiny of scientific peer review. This mentality has even seeped into academic science, Mirowski argues. He points to the rise of university technology transfer offices that encourage professors to market their research and materials transfer agreements (MTAs) that inhibit the flow of scientific information.

Is the rise of privatized, globalized science anything other than a natural transition from the foreign policy pressures of the Cold War to the fiscal pressures of the 1970s? Mirowski acknowledges that the Cold War regime could not last forever, and even if he largely gives a pass to the military's midcentury dominance of science, his book is not nostalgic. Yet there is a whiff of conspiracy about his discussion of the all-powerful neoliberal economists. While he does propose a bounded working definition of neoliberalism at several points in his text, at other times the cast of characters and ideas identified as neoliberal can be sprawling. Earlier and more focused attention to the science base, a critical concept that flits through the narrative, would have made it easier to grasp what was lost amid the changes Mirowski describes. For most of the book, however, Mirowski delivers a thickly institutional history of ideas that shows scientists enmeshed with the commercial corporation, the state, and the university. His account of how the balances between each have shifted over time raises important questions that deserve continued discussion.

JENNIFER BURNS
Stanford University

KEITH POMAKOY. Helping Humanity: American Policy and Genocide Rescue. Lanham, Md.: Lexington Books. 2011. Pp. xi, 235. $70.00.

Nobody really knows what genocide is, and often there is nothing any country can do to impede it, but somehow the United States has managed to respond to it as promptly and effectively as possible every time. This is Keith Pomakoy's peculiar and unconvincing thesis.

Pomakoy highlights five case studies of U.S. responses to genocide. The first is Cuba. He estimates that 170,000 civilians died in the 1890s during the war between the Spanish colonial regime and Cuban rebels, and that figure "make[s] this a large enough catastrophe . . . to qualify the event as genocide" (p. 15). The United States responded; the U.S. public contributed generously to Cuban relief efforts, and the McKinley administration eventually resorted to military force to oust the Spanish. But does the Cuban experience even belong in a book about genocide? It is not until 180 pages later that Pomakoy finally concedes "it is not clear" if the Cuban episode was genocide (p. 197).

Pomakoy also cites Japanese atrocities in the late 1930s and 1940s as one of the case studies. However, he admits Japan's actions did not really constitute genocide as we know it, because they "probably stemmed from simple cruelty rather than from ideology" (p. 132). As a result, his Japanese "case study" occupies less than two pages.

The slaughter of the Armenians by the Turks, and the mass starvation of Ukrainian peasants by Joseph Stalin each merit a chapter. Although Pomakoy contends there was nothing the United States could have done to interrupt the Armenian genocide, Near East Relief, a private agency, raised over $100 million for the Armenians. By contrast, if the U.S. government had lodged any protest regarding the Ukrainians, Moscow would likely have ignored it, and humanitarian relief would have been blocked, he maintains.

Pomakoy's chapter on the Holocaust is his least coherent. He veers back and forth between defending Franklin D. Roosevelt's administration for not helping Europe's Jews and insisting that the Roosevelt administration did aid them. U.S. immigration policy "may not have been pretty," he caustically asserts (p. 139), but if the United States had opened its doors, that action "would probably have resulted in an uncontrollable exodus of Europe's undesirables" (p. 136). Yet, almost in the same breath, he refers to "the myth of closed doors," asserting that "America accepted over 150,000 Jews from the Greater German Reich before the start of the war" (p. 134). In fact, reputable historians have calculated that only about 75,000 Jews from Germany (and later Austria) were admitted to the United States between 1933 and 1939. Pomakoy does not mention that over 100,000 slots in the quota for German nationals sat unused during that period.

Pomakoy's survey of the U.S. response to Nazi genocide in the 1940s is likewise problematic. He says Roosevelt "[did not] suspect Hitler's plan to kill millions until too late" (p. 133); in fact, Roosevelt publicly confirmed it in December 1942, when most of the six million were still alive. Pomakoy claims that the United States could not have pressured German satellites to release Jews because Germany "had the power to enforce its will upon the satellite states" (p. 126); but Bulgaria, Romania, and Hungary did defy the Nazis and spare Jews at various junctures.

Pomakoy argues that bombing Auschwitz would have been a mistake. His reasoning is novel if nothing else: since Japan committed war crimes without having death camps, the Hitler regime would have killed some Jews even if its death camps were destroyed; and if the United States bombed Auschwitz, it would have felt obliged to bomb all the death camps, and doing so would have "prolonged the war" (p. 147). In other words, if they could not save everyone, they should not have tried to save anyone.

As for responding to the ongoing Darfur genocide and future atrocities, Pomakoy proposes a new strategy: the international community should negotiate with war criminals rather than punish them, since "any dictator worth his death squad knows that [bringing war criminals to trial] represents an ideal that the community of nations has been unable to approach. . . [F]ew perpetrators have found themselves on trial" (p. 202). He seems to be saying, in effect, that since few perpetrators have been brought to trial so far, there is no point in trying to capture and punish any others. A book about the history of U.S. responses to genocide is not required to include policy recommendations; but since Pomakoy chooses to go down that road, one wishes he would have come up with something a little more creative.

RAFAEL MEDOFF

David S. Wyman Institute for Holocaust Studies

CARIBBEAN AND LATIN AMERICA

PHILLIP DEHNE. On the Far Western Front: Britain's First World War in South America. New York: Manchester University Press. 2009. Pp. xiii, 280. $89.95.

Interest in World War I remains robust. Far more than with World War II, scholarship has focused on Europe. Phillip Dehne's book is another in a series of welcome studies that expand understandings of the Great War beyond Europe. Dehne makes clear his aims early: to "integrate the hitherto disparate histories of the First World War, particularly the economic war, with those of imperialism, dependency, and national identity" (p. 5). It is an ambitious agenda.

While the book's title suggests that this is a history of British interactions with South America, in truth it is not. It is a study of British communities in Brazil, Argentina, and Uruguay. Dehne begins with Anglo-German antagonism prior to 1914. Contrary to historians who have emphasized British fears regarding American trade competition, Dehne argues that worries about the spread of German commerce preoccupied the British before 1914. This unease was felt by those whose sense of superiority rested not just on their longstanding commercial and financial supremacy in South America but also on their conception of a Greater Britain. Thus when the war began, men such as Sir Reginald Tower, the British minister to Argentina from 1911 to 1919, were appalled at the hesitancy of London's response. Tower wanted a full-blooded prosecution of the war, which would entail driving German raiders from the seas, purging German employees from British firms, and dismantling German control in trades such as coffee and grains.

Lobbying from the periphery overlapped with the rivalry between the Foreign Office and the Board to Trade for control of the economic war and ultimately led to the establishment of the Foreign Trade Department (FTD) in 1915. The FTD represented the triumph of the Foreign Office. Its chief weapon was the Statutory Lists, designed to prohibit interaction with firms that were suspected of German ties. Dehne shows that the FTD relied heavily on the input of the British in South America for compiling the Statutory Lists. In the first flush of war enthusiasm, some Britons resident in South America hoped that the conflict might be the vehicle through which their supremacy could be enshrined permanently. This proved illusory due, in part, to the entrenched strength of German companies such as Bunge and Born, which controlled much of the Argentinean grain trade. But it was also due to a lack of cooperation. The Americans were unresponsive to British prodding, while the Brazilian, Argentinean, and Uruguayan governments harbored doubts to varying degrees. Conscious of American half-heartedness and seeing little that would benefit their peoples in furthering British commercial preeminence, their compliance was tepid. With the armistice, the Statutory Lists were abandoned and the FTD was soon dissolved. Notions of a Greater Britain receded as the 1920s waned. By the 1930s, the British position in South America was a shadow of what it had been in 1914.

Dehne is right to observe that little has been written on imperialism, economics, and the war—at least recently. Certainly Marxist interpretations from V. I. Lenin onward remind us that this once was a flourishing area of disputation. On the whole, however, the book fails to convince. Economic historians will be dismayed by the cursory analysis of the mechanisms at work in shaping the trading patterns between Europe and South America, irrespective of the war. Political historians will observe that most of those in London who heard the tocsin described by Dehne were well down the ranks of the great. There is little in this account to suggest that the heavyweights of British economic and political life ever gave any sustained thought to the "Far Western Front" or to the economic war thereon. Historians of imperialism will cavil at an account in which interaction seems to be represented chiefly by the complaints of British merchants and traders. If the British in South America were solidly in the camp that advocated a war to the bitter end, there was a price to pay for this stance postwar, and that price was exhaustion. The City of London had never favored war that led to prostration. But Dehne ignores the City, and the role of the "gentlemanly capitalism" of P. J. Cain and A. G. Hopkins in economic war and at the periphery thus remains unexplored. Nor will historians whose concerns include national identity feel satisfied. Consideration of what it meant to be British in South America, and to believe in the idea of a Greater Britain, largely disappears after the opening chapters.

So does the book succeed? It does broach new ground, it does try to challenge timeworn verities about the war, and it does suggest the multiple ways in which such complex issues as imperialism, economics, conflict, and national identity need to be tackled. Yet conceptual ambition outpaces execution.

MARTIN HORN

McMaster University

MELINA PAPPADEMOS. Black Political Activism and the Cuban Republic. (Envisioning Cuba.) Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 323. $39.95.

This book is based on little-known sources about black political activism during the years of the quasi-independent Cuban Republic (1902–1958). Melina Pappademos relies largely upon extensive research into articles published in black as well as mainstream newspapers, both national and regional; documents generated by elite black social, cultural, and mutual aid societies and their loosely organized national coalitions; and oral history interviews. She places her detailed study into an overarching interpretation of the primacy of patron-client relations in Cuban politics. Black clubs, which never dared to call themselves political because of the violent governmental response to autonomous black political power, managed to promote the distribution of resources to the tiny Cuban black elite, some of which was then redistributed to its followers in return for delivering black votes to their patrons. Pappademos admires the relentless ingenuity of these black leaders and their efforts to advance their social, economic, and cultural image. She recognizes, however, that the elite's role in empowering the marginalized and intensely exploited black masses was minimal, pointing out that it was only with the organization of the Cuban Communist Party and the labor unions it led among cigar, dock, transit, and sugar workers that the struggle for the rights of the black masses emerged in Cuba.

Understanding this book requires some background in the extraordinary history of Afro-Cuba. The transatlantic slave trade continued well into the nineteenth century, and the abolition of slavery ushered in thirty years of warfare that brought about Cuban independence. Slaves, former slaves, and free people of color at all military ranks, including many officers, played major roles in these brutal wars. Despite the international respectability of "scientific" racism, Cuba's first constitution (1901) granted full equality, including the right to vote, to all Cuban men. These often sham legalities have been embraced by ideologues of a "raceless" Cuba that persists in Cuban political thought. Racism remained prevalent in Cuban society during the early republican period, as evidenced by the devastating and unprovoked massacre of blacks in the bloody "race" war of 1912. Pappademos passes over this racist heritage too lightly in her effort to minimize its impact on subsequent black protest in Cuba. She unjustly criticizes the pioneering work of Aline Helg, Our Rightful Share: The Afro-Cuban Struggle for Equality, 1886–1912 (1995).

The author avoids overreaching in her interpretation, but leaves us with some unresolved questions. The biggest one is whether the clubs she meticulously studied could actually be defined as "black political activism," as signaled by the book's title, or were instead mechanisms for the control and repression of "black political activism." Another important question concerns the author's use of the term "black." For Latin America, and Cuba in particular, the term "people of color" encompasses shades of skin color that were and remain important. Nor does Pappademos use the term "Afro-descendant," pointing out that the black elite in Cuba rejected everything African. I suspect they would have rejected the term black as well.

GWENDOLYN MIDLO HALL
Michigan State University

MARISELLE MELÉNDEZ. Deviant and Useful Citizens: The Cultural Production of the Female Body in Eighteenth-Century Peru. Nashville, Tenn.: Vanderbilt University Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 235. $55.00.

Scholars of the colonial Andes willing to write a history of the body in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries would find the endeavor difficult to accomplish as the experience of corporeality is elusive in the sources. Depictions of individuals are uncommon, and stereotypical faces populate paintings produced in the period. Dissections, surgeries, and embalming were performed regularly, but if detailed observations were written down, they have not survived. Diseases were rarely described and, if so, such descriptions are often opaque. Although society was normally imagined as a body (the king was the head and the Indians the feet), real bodies seem to have remained unexamined in diverse treatises and artwork. It is safe to say that this overwhelming silence continued in the early eighteenth century. In the later part of the century, however, we find evidence of concern for the body both visually and in writing. Although Peruvian examples do not abound as in Mexico, some of those surviving are especially rich.

In this book, Mariselle Meléndez argues that in the eighteenth century the colonial body was seen "as a type of cultural text constantly written by those seeking to consolidate power and control" (p. 7). This work is not properly a history of the body in colonial Peru, but an interrogation of discrete texts to elucidate how the female body was represented using the aforementioned conceptual premise. The example of a rebellious woman and three texts are each the subject of a chapter. First Meléndez examines the political body as represented in the insurrectional activities, trial, and execution of Micaela Bastidas, the wife of the famous Indian rebel Túpac Amaru. Next the author focuses on the economically productive body, as depicted in Baltazar Martínez de Compañón's Trujillo del Perú. Chapter three studies the religious body through a close examination of a history of the monastery of the Trinitarias Descalzas de Lima, written by Sor María Josefa de la Santísima Trinidad (1783). The fourth and final chapter studies scientific approaches to the female body through an analysis of articles published in the Mercurio Peruano journal, the voice of the patriotic Sociedad de Amantes del País, an association that epitomized enlightened thinking in late colonial Peru.

Mercurio Peruano is a well-known publication and has been studied by a number of specialists, and the Túpac Amaru insurrection has been the subject of countless essays and books. Micaela Bastidas, as Meléndez rightly asserts, has remained a figure of secondary importance. The numerous watercolors commissioned by Bishop Martínez de Compañón are now accessible on the internet and have received scholarly attention. The history of the Lima monastery is much less known. Meléndez's analysis is original due to a focus on the female body and its place within the renewed project of colonial control brought by Bourbon rule. The strength of the book resides in the author's use of cultural and literary theory to draw interesting connections between Peruvian sources and investigations about the body in similar or comparable contexts in Mexico and in Europe. The book's theoretical premise is better achieved in the chapters on Mercurio Peruano and Trujillo del Perú than in those devoted to Micaela Bastidas and the Lima monastery. Meléndez makes intriguing observations about the salient role fear played in Bastidas's political activism and personal life but seems uncritical of Bastidas's deep authoritarianism. The chapter about the monastery's history does not show whether the experience of religious women in eighteenth-century Lima was exceptional or unique as compared to that of nuns living in earlier centuries. This book's most important contribution resides in the questions asked about a subject in Latin American history that is still in need of further research.

GABRIELA RAMOS
University of Cambridge

JAMES A. WOOD. The Society of Equality: Popular Republicanism and Democracy in Santiago de Chile, 1818–1851. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press. 2011. Pp. x, 333. $29.95.

There was a time when the common people seemed to have no place in the historiography of nineteenth-century Latin American politics. Only elite groups and warlords, it was said, took part in the decision-making processes leading to the formation of national states, relegating their plebeian counterparts to the passive roles of retainers, cheering crowds, or mere cannon fodder. Thanks to a series of studies carried out over the past two decades, this has changed. Often inspired by the subaltern studies perspective, recent scholarship has shown that peasants, indigenous communities, craftsmen, the urban poor, even slaves engaged actively in politics, bringing their own agendas, engaging in skillful negotiations, and exhibiting remarkable familiarity with the ideological idioms of the time. And when this interplay crossed the line between peaceful dialogue and violent confrontation, as so often happened in nineteenth-century Latin America, non-elite actions conformed more to thoughtful calculation than to blind and aimless instinct.

James A. Wood's study fits squarely within this growing field of scholarship. Focusing on Santiago's artisan classes, he reconstructs their early politicization from national independence in 1818 to the 1850–1851 formation and demise of the association that gives the book its title. Restoring continuity and depth to a process hitherto known mostly in fragments, the author proves that the Society of Equality was actually the culmination of a tradition that can be traced to the earliest years of state formation. Wood convincingly labels this tradition "popular republicanism," in line with a phenomenon that has been identified for this period in other Latin American countries, not to mention the United States and Europe. As in those other places, Chilean popular republicanism appealed to citizen rights, prominently that of equality, that formed the backbone of an ideology anchored to the principle of popular sovereignty. Artisans thought such rights were fair compensation for mandatory service in the "Civic Guard," which aided the national state in keeping public order. These claims, however, were hotly contested by elite groups who were wedded to more exclusionary visions of republicanism, not a rare occurrence in nineteenth-century politics worldwide. The resulting tensions and debates that traversed Chile's emergent public sphere shaped the plot that articulates the book.

Among the many strengths to be found in Wood's study, there are three I would like to stress: its originality, its meticulous research, and its sensitivity toward the wider social and political context in which Santiago's artisan politics were situated. Regarding the first, this early period of plebeian politicization has been covered only fragmentarily, focusing mostly on salient conjunctures such as the implementation of the liberal 1828 Constitution, the raucous elections of 1841 and 1846, or the short-lived experiment of the Society of Equality itself. Giving these highlights due credit, Wood places them in a sequence that retrieves the full historicity of the process, thereby recognizing the artisans as true political agents rather than mere occasional sidekicks to elite politicians. This rests fundamentally on the book's second major accomplishment: the painstaking coverage of primary sources, especially the period's underutilized political press, which enables the author to fill gaps in previous scholarship. Finally, and in welcome contrast to some working-class historiography, artisans are placed within the wider frame of national state-building and international political trends. In particular, the author is careful to flesh out the connection between artisan groups and young upper-class rebels who were inflamed by the European revolutionary wave of the 1840s, a connection that led directly to the foundation of the Society of Equality in Chile.

Amid these very substantial achievements, one criticism that could be leveled at Wood's work is his choice not to engage directly in debates regarding popular political agency issuing from Chile's "New Social History." It is true that Wood has explicitly restricted his analysis to artisans, a group not typically prominent in a historiography more inclined to concentrate on the rural and urban poor at large. All the same, it will seem odd to Chilean readers that names such as Gabriel Salazar and María Angélica Illanes should appear only fleetingly in a book devoted to popular politics. As evidenced by his bibliography, Wood is fully familiar with these authors; hence, it must be assumed that he deliberately chose not to enter potentially controversial terrain. This qualification notwithstanding, Wood has written a fine book that stands as a welcome contribution to the growing literature on Chile's non-elite historical actors.

JULIO PINTO VALLEJOS
Universidad de Santiago de Chile

LESSIE JO FRAZIER. Salt in the Sand: Memory, Violence, and the Nation-State in Chile, 1890 to the Present. (Politics, History, and Culture.) Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press. 2007. Pp. xvii, 388. Cloth $84.95, paper $23.95.

Lessie Jo Frazier's book on northern Chile is superb. The work centers on the study of historical memory by Chilean specialists within and outside the country. Frazier focuses on the province of Tarapacá, once the center of prosperity based on nitrate exports, roughly from 1880 to 1930. She ties what happened then and in the early Cold War to the more recent barbarities of General Augusto Pinochet (1973–1990). Frazier shows how the contest to establish the meaning of the presidency of Salvador Allende Gossens and the Pinochet dictatorship reflects a much longer tale about the abuse of state power in the province, and how memories of official violence have been sustained, erased, or modified to suit ideological objectives. Her work is a brilliant addition to the historiography of military regimes in Latin America and to traumatic events in twentieth-century Europe.

The events following Pinochet's coup against socialist President Allende in September 1973 are now well known: the armed forces proceeded to kill thousands, summarily imprison and torture tens of thousands, and drive hundreds of thousands out of the country. Frazier, however, situates this story in Iquique, Tarapacá's major city and a birthplace of the nation's Left. She combines methodologies from anthropology, history, and literary analysis to show how the regime distorted the memory and objectives of Allende's government, turning a declining Tarapacá into a bustling example of neoliberal development, complete with a new shopping center and privatized white beaches. She does much more, however. Having visited the region since 1991, she gathered stories from the city's abandoned residents and nitrate laborers. Interviewees recount their memories of the army's killing of a thousand striking miners and family members at the Santa Maria School in 1907 and again at San Gregorio in 1921, in the neighboring province of Antofagasta, and at La Coruña in 1925. Frazier also interviews people who had heard these horrific stories from their parents and so carried haunting memories into the present. She weaves patterns established in the past, drawing connections to massacres implemented by the military dictatorship. After freeing Tarapacá of "subversion" and establishing an "authoritarian democracy," Pinochet made Iquique his second home, a refuge from repression and Chile's declining industrial base. She reminds us, in a particularly moving chapter about the city of Pisagua, that for decades a variety of governments made use of the city's isolation and harsh sun to detain leftists and homosexuals without due process. Indeed, it was in this remote region that the bodies of torture victims were found in 1990, preserved by the climate and chemical features of the soil. This event undermined claims by Pinochet's supporters that the dictatorship had been waging war against internal subversion. Images of these murders created a public scandal uncovering the regime's true nature.

Frazier goes further than other scholars by linking the economic policies of Pinochet to the contested memories that followed his rule. She demonstrates that the coalition government, the Concertación, continued the dictatorship's policies and avoided confrontations with those who had committed murder and torture. In its two-decade tenure, it replaced the popular demand for "justice" with the official pursuit of "reconciliation" so that the tortured and their torturers could get on with their lives. Tens of thousands of Chileans struggled to deal with what they had endured; some victims were shattered by their marginalization. Frazier is critical of psychology, even though she borrows some of its concepts. According to Frazier, Chile's "psychologism" has led to "the appropriation of psychological terms and practices as part of hegemonic state projects" (p. 219). Chileans have moved on to the consumerism and neoliberal class structure that Pinochet and the Concertación imposed and sustained. In general, I agree with her, the new order tends to relegate the role that class struggle played in forging Chile to that of an "anachronism" without representation.

Current President Sebastián Piñera's billionaire fortune bloomed under Pinochet's rule. And yet, a dissident subculture remains. Frazier acknowledges this and we must remember her book was published five years ago. Over the last two years, and especially since August, high school and university students have denounced the educational inequities that perpetuate Chile's rigid class structure, creating the largest mass protests since the dictatorship. The U.S. press gives them little notice, but the students have raised questions of justice and not reconciliation; they do not hide their admiration for the militants who came before them. Left-wing demands have always been central to democratizing Chile. The contest is not over.

MICHAEL MONTEÓN
University of California,
San Diego

EUROPE: ANCIENT AND MEDIEVAL

PETER HUNT. War, Peace, and Alliance in Demosthenes' Athens. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2010. Pp. xiii, 317. $99.00.

In this book, Peter Hunt addresses the questions of how classical Athenians felt about issues of war and peace and their relationship to other states, what motivated them to make the decisions they did in these areas, and the extent to which they were swayed by pragmatic rather than idealistic or moral reasons. Hunt squeezes everything he can out of the extant literary evidence, especially oratorical, philosophical, and political works, and also applies modern theories of international relations and interstate law to these questions. Because no actual political speeches survive from the fifth century, Hunt takes as his main body of evidence the surviving speeches of the fourth-century statesman and orator Demosthenes, although he fails to consider Demosthenes' last speech, To Philip's Letter (11), of 340, which is a surprising oversight as it called on the Athenians to go to war against Philip II of Macedonia.

The book has eleven chapters: an introduction explains Hunt's thesis, the evidence on which he draws, and his theories to establish it. Each of the motives Hunt puts forward to explain the Athenians' attitude to war and alliance is treated in its own chapter. Chapter two, "Economics," discusses the role of economic considerations in making decisions; chapter three, "Militarism," examines Athens' militaristic culture; and chapter four, "The Unequal Treatment of States," considers the types of states with which the Athenians dealt and ideological considerations such as ethnicity and religion. Two chapters follow on how relationships within the home and society may be applied to foreign policy. Chapter five, "Household Metaphors," discusses how the roles of household members were used to frame foreign policy, and chapter six, "Defense and Attack," connects an individual's right of self-defense to that of the state if provoked or even to act preemptively. The next three chapters are all to do with modern conceptions of international relations and law: "Calculations of Interest" (chapter seven), "Reciprocity" (chapter eight), and "Legalism" (chapter nine). Chapter ten, "Peace," discusses general attitudes to peace and whether the people preferred peace over war (that the Greeks, unlike today, never talked of a time when warfare would be abandoned gives a clue). The final chapter is a brief conclusion.

I was surprised to see no mention of Hugo Montgomery's The Way to Chaeronea: Foreign Policy, Decision-making, and Political Influence in Demosthenes' Speeches (1983), which also uses Demosthenes' speeches to discuss the workings of the democracy and what motivated people to make decisions. A problem always with symbouleutic oratory, Hunt's main body of evidence, is that we have only Demosthenes' speeches, and then only some of them (Hunt describes the pitfalls of oratory on pp. 15–25). True, some of Demosthenes' speeches refer to other speakers in a particular debate, but we have no idea what those who proposed alternative policies and reasons or motives said.

At times it seems that Hunt's conclusions are not quite as novel as he wants to make out. Thus in chapter two, the existence of different perceptions of war among the rich and poor strata of society, with the former less in favor of warfare because they had to pay for it, is hardly a surprise. Nor is the conclusion in the third chapter that Athens' "militarism" (military service and ability) was a major factor that caused the Athenians to go to war. An argument advanced in the fifth chapter—that Athenians should be like the men of the household and not women or slaves when dealing with other states—also seems obvious; the orators' use of analogy here is bound up with the Athenian attitude to masculinity and a call to the men to emulate the heroic deeds of their ancestors. There is always a danger applying modern theories and considerations to the ancient world, and parts of chapters seven, eight, and nine seem strained. Hunt makes good points, however, about the orators' use of the balance of power argument (e.g., pp. 168–180) and is right to accept that international law was a Greek invention (chapter nine).

Hunt's book demonstrates that Athenians were guided by a complex web of motives in their attitude to war and alliance, could make sophisticated decisions, and, further, that an orator like Demosthenes crafted the content of his speeches accordingly. His book makes stimulating and provocative reading. At the end of the day, however, I would say that Athens' "militarism" plus Athenian dependency on imported grain to survive (dealt with in the second chapter, in which Hunt draws the analogy with countries that today depend on oil to function) explain the Athenians' attitude to war and alliance more compellingly than applying modern theories to the ancient world.

IAN WORTHINGTON
University of Missouri

BEZALEL BAR-KOCHVA. The Image of the Jews in Greek Literature: The Hellenistic Period. (Hellenistic Culture and Society, number 51.) Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 2010. Pp. xiv, 606. $95.00.

In this book Bezalel Bar-Kochva studies the references to Jews in the literary remains of twelve Greek authors of the Hellenistic period (ca. 300 B.C.E. to the first half of the first century B.C.E.). They are Theophrastus, Clearchus, Hecataeus of Abdera, Megasthenes, Hermippus of Smyrna, Mnaseas of Patara, the Seleucid court scribe (or Seleucid propaganda bureau), Agatharchides of Cnidus, Lysimachus of Alexandria, Posidonius of Apamea, Timochares, and Apollonius Molon. The whole is rounded out by an introduction, a conclusion, an extensive bibliography, and a detailed index. Most of the chapters appeared originally as articles in Hebrew journals in Israel; they have been extensively revised for translation and publication here.

All of the texts discussed in this book appear in Me-nahem Stern's Greek and Latin Authors on Jews and Judaism: Volume 1 (1974), so they are well known to scholars. What Bar-Kochva has done is to provide an extraordinarily thorough, philologically detailed, and literarily sensitive analysis of each set of texts. Much of his work is devoted to source criticism because none of these texts is extant in its original form; our access to them is second-hand, courtesy of quotations and paraphrases in later texts (mostly Josephus's Against Apion). From these fragments the interpreter has to try to reconstruct the content and contours of the original works, now lost, and to determine how the various parts fit together. Bar-Kochva excels at this kind of analysis. Particularly impressive are his discussions of the chains of transmission of the three main libels (as he calls them) against the Jews: the charge that they worship an ass and/or that they have a statue of an ass in their temple; the charge that they annually kill and eat a foreigner and/or sacrifice a foreigner as a religious ritual; and the charge that their ancestors were lepers expelled from Egypt. Each of these three charges occurs in a range of ancient authors, and Bar-Kochva disentangles their literary interrelationships with ingenuity and skill.

The general scholarly view is that the earliest Greek authors (late fourth through third centuries B.C.E.) had positive views of the Jews, even to the point of admiration. But in the second century B.C.E., after the Jews entered the rough and tumble world of Hellenistic politics, the positive views became negative and the admiration turned to scorn. In particular, Antiochus Epiphanes's attack on the Jerusalem temple in the 160s B.C.E. and the subsequent battles between the Seleucids and the Jews, and between Greek city-states and the Jews, provided fertile ground for anti-Jewish stories. These stories were then picked up and developed in Alexandria to serve the needs of the anti-Jewish groups there, particularly in the first century C.E. Bar-Kochva does not dispute the truth of this commonly accepted scholarly trajectory but observes that there are exceptions to these patterns and that we must allow authors to express their individuality. In particular he argues that Posidonius, an important intellectual of the first century B.C.E., admired the "original" legislation of Moses, but decried the subsequent developments in Judaism (including the Jews' construction of an independent state at the expense of their neighbors).

In sum, this is an immensely learned book by an immensely learned scholar, a work to be consulted by all future students of this material. Since the author is such a careful philologist, one wonders why he refers to "Jews" throughout the book. Surely in many passages, wherever a text is speaking about the ethnic group whose homeland is Judaea, "Judaeans" would be a better translation. The author also occasionally uses the terms "anti-Semitic" in connection with some Greeks (see p. 3, n. 1), and "orthodox" in connection with some Jews, but surely these anachronistic terms are best avoided, even in quotation marks.

SHAYE J. D. COHEN
Harvard University

HENRIK MOURITSEN. The Freedman in the Roman World. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. vi, 344. $99.00.

Henrik Mouritsen's excellent study fills the need for an updated synthesis on Roman freedmen. The book covers the centuries between the Second Punic War and the early third century, though most of the evidence marshaled falls between ca. 60 B.C.E. and 100 C.E.: that is, from Cicero to silver-age Latin. Geographically, the cities strung along the western coast of central Italy form the "Roman world" that comes under scrutiny. Mouritsen deploys an impressive range of epigraphic and literary evidence; Roman law is invoked when necessary, though the skepticism reserved for legal evidence in this volume is severe indeed. Mouritsen prefers epistolary to moralizing and fictional literature, as even the irrepressible Trimalchio recedes into the background. There is no doubting what anchors this presentation of Roman freedmen: urban inscriptions.

Mouritsen opens with a compelling demonstration of the way that Roman ideologies of slavery shaped norms of manumission. Natural slave theory was conspicuously absent in Roman culture. Roman ideology, rather, insisted that slavery denatured the victim: the experience of domination made a person servile and thus the object of robust prejudice. Manumission was supposed to benefit, selectively, those who were least damaged by the trauma of slavery. Roman manumission was unusually generous, in that certain forms conferred full citizenship. Yet the open character of manumission must be contextualized in light of the peculiarities of the Roman familia. The master became a paternal figure by giving social life to the deracinated slave. Mouritsen consistently emphasizes the informal nature of the patron's father-like powers, which were "only partly enshrined in law" (p. 56).

At the center of the book, in every way, is a lengthy chapter on the practice of manumission. Here Mouritsen brings to bear his deep understanding of the epigraphic record. As he argues, the astonishing volume of libertine epitaphs is not a trustworthy source of demographic evidence and it is no reflection at all of the frequency of manumission. Yet this awareness is the central tension of this book, for Mouritsen regularly describes manumission as "very common" (p. 141) and "unusually frequent" (p. 143), while elsewhere we hear that "only a minority of slaves were freed" (p. 194). Compounding this tension is the fact that there was no single type of "Roman freedman." Roman slavery was a highly segmented institution; Mouritsen admits that rural slaves had vanishingly small hopes of freedom, so his focus is on the cities. The analysis is not explicitly situated within a model of Roman slavery writ large, and in that sense it is a deeply empiricist work. Throughout this study, we are in the midst of the high aristocracy and their slaves, from Cicero's letters to the great columbaria of the senatorial elite. This crucial segment of the slave system had its peculiarities: extreme specialization, commercial integration, and an abundance of male slaves. These slaves are also the most visible in the inscriptions. Mouritsen de-emphasizes manumission by self-purchase, testamentary manumission, and informal manumission, as well as contractual labor services between patrons and freedmen, all of which figure prominently in the legal literature but find exiguous documentation in the epigraphic record. Yet, to offer one counter-example, a thick docket of actual legal cases preserved in the Justinianic Code, falling just after Mouritsen's timeframe, suggests that relations between patrons and freedmen were indeed highly contentious and operated in the shadow of the law, at least among slaveholders less illustrious than the Cicerones and Caesares (which is to say, the vast majority of them). Mouritsen argues against a purely "rational" use of manumission as an incentive for labor; while he presents an evenhanded case (explaining, for instance, that some slaves freed at a young age must have been manumitted on the brink of death), the account would be more convincing if it reckoned explicitly with the internal diversity of the slave system.

For Mouritsen, integration within the elite familia was the key to the freedman's place in society. He argues, persuasively, that the social ascendance of freedmen was a "sponsored mobility." The corollary is that wealthy, independent freedmen have been overestimated; Roman freedmen became wealthy because their position in the familia gave them access to capital and patronage. In a final chapter, Mouritsen sensitively argues that the valorization of familial bonds—rather than a subconscious urge to advertise freedom—lies behind the great mass of funerary epigraphy produced by the libertine classes.

This book is the first fully reliable synthesis of Roman freedmen, but it is more than that. It is a powerful intervention in ongoing debates over the scale and nature of Roman slavery. This study emphasizes the importance of cities, commerce, and the familia. Given the compelling use of the epigraphic record, it is an intervention that should prompt considerable reflection. Ultimately, what must be decided is the extent to which Mouritsen's image—Latin epigraphy's image—of "the" freedman in the Roman world is fully representative.

KYLE HARPER

University of Oklahoma

ERIC ADLER. Valorizing the Barbarians: Enemy Speeches in Roman Historiography. (Ashley and Peter Larkin Series in Greek and Roman Culture.) Austin: University of Texas Press. 2011. Pp. x, 269. $55.00.

In the speeches they craft for their historical agents, historians of Rome sometimes criticize Roman imperialistic and colonializing practices. Eric Adler's monograph is devoted to this phenomenon. In order to explore the range of anti-Roman sentiments expressed, he takes a comparative approach, pairing Sallust's Epistula Mithridatis with the speech of Mithridates in Pompeius Trogus (as preserved by Justin); the Hannibals of Polybius and Livy before both Ticinus and Zama (and the corresponding speeches of Publius Scipio and Scipio Africanus); and the Boudicas, and their implied respondents, of Tacitus and Cassius Dio (as preserved by Xiphilinus). The six main chapters follow the same format. For each historian Adler explains why we can read the speeches (and the one letter) as free compositions, analyzes the relevant text in detail, and discusses parallel passages in the historian's oeuvre. Each chapter ends with useful recapitulation.

Although close reading comprises the bulk of the book, Adler casts wide conceptual and methodological nets, taking into consideration "recourse to fetial law; administrative corruption; greed and plunder; gender and sexuality; the 'Noble Savage'; ethnic stereotyping; and senatorial libertas" (p. 4) and "the historicity of speeches; the use of orations in historical works; the import of emulation in speech composition; the potential reasons for authors' inclusion of orations in their writing," as well as who among the historians are more critical and who less so, and how their chronological or ethnic circumstances influence their views (p. 5). An appendix contains all the texts in the original and in English. The book has endnotes rather than footnotes, with the attendant necessity of flipping back and forth to see whether or not more than a reference is being given. The English was proofread more carefully than the ancient texts; in the main body of the book the most consequential slips are societatem. Ab for societatem, ab (p. 27) and a passage of Dio that runs past what Adler apparently intended (p. 148).

In the introduction Adler raises a central difficulty: in the absence of any direct evidence, how do we know how a contemporary audience responded to these speeches? After cataloguing our lack of resources, he shifts ground and suggests that we can follow the historian's own emphases (such as repeated themes and correspondence between speech and narrative) and adherence to protocols laid out in ancient rhetorical handbooks. Further, "the very existence of arguments in [the speeches] that strike modern readers as trenchant and persuasive speaks to the power of these rhetorical creations" (pp. 13–14). These modes of evaluation seem problematic: Adler repeatedly (e.g., pp. 22, 46, 108) imagines ancient readers comparing the contents of speeches with knowledge of events gleaned from earlier narrative material, but those same readers probably knew their own past far better than we do and accordingly could assess any account by multiple measures. Historians had many reasons for making speakers report versions at odds with the narrative, and, as Adler notes (p. 12), gauging ancient responses from ours is highly subjective, even if, one might add, modern readings were univocal.

They are not. For example, Hannibal refers to "having power over Roman prosperity" (Polybius 3.63.4; quoted p. 66). Adler does not see him as an imperialist, but there is a case for that interpretation. Adler finds "an explicit link between Roman moral failings and the Republic's unjust colonial administration" in Cato's address to the Senate. I had to reread, multiple times, the passage quoted (Sallust, Catiline 52.19–22; quoted p. 30) before concluding that Adler is referring to foris iustum imperium. To put it quantitatively, Adler can identify as significant three words plucked from seventy-six but gloss over a five-word phrase in a thirty-three-word extract. How indeed can we know what the historians intended or ancient readers heard?

The book sits uneasily in its scholarly contexts. By topic, it is trendy, and by approach it could make good use of the past quarter century's excellent work on the ancient historians as literary artists. Adler knows the recent literature but gets little mileage from it. For example, he summarizes the work of Andrew Laird (Powers of Expression, Expressions of Power: Speech Presentation and Latin Literature [1999]) on direct and indirect discourse (p. 8) but regularly records oratio recta and oratio obliqua without commenting on why the usage matters (e.g., pp. 53, 65, 74, 76, 99, 103, 132). In general the book would benefit from scholarship since the “linguistic turn” of the mid 1980s, but Adler relies on earlier scholarly views.

The final chapter contains a careful catalogue of conclusions, the most important of which may be that the original audiences must not have recoiled when their historians included speeches critical of Rome (pp. 168–169). Generally speaking, Adler has brought forward provocative subject matter, but one could wish that he had expanded our thinking more.

JANE D. CHAPLIN
Middlebury College

RAYMOND VAN DAM. Remembering Constantine at the Milvian Bridge. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 296. $90.00.

Constantine's victory at the Battle of the Milvian Bridge in 312 C.E. is a famous episode in both the history of the Roman Empire and that of Christianity. In the usual overview, Constantine felt slighted when he was not made emperor by the other tetrarchs (or college of emperors) upon the death of his father Constantius in the summer of 306. His father's army hailed him as Augustus, and later Constantine received official recognition as Caesar (in the tetrarchy the title of a junior emperor). Constantine ultimately invaded Italy to fight Maxentius (another Caesar who was the son of a tetrarch and Constantine's brother-in-law). Their forces met at the Milvian Bridge outside Rome on October 28 of 312. According to the standard narrative, which follows the church historian Eusebius, Constantine had a vision of a cross in the sky and (in Greek) the message that translates into English as “conquer by this,” followed by a dream in which Christ appeared to him and commanded him to display the sign that Eusebius describes as the Greek letters Chi and Rho superimposed one on the other. Constantine had his troops put the sign on their shields, made a battle standard of it, and won the battle. A few months later in 313 Constantine and the Emperor Licinius issued a law, often called the “Edict of Milan,” that granted toleration for Christianity. Thus, the Battle of the Milvian Bridge stands as a “turning point” in the career of Constantine and in the history of Christianity (which would become the de facto official religion of the empire by the end of the fourth century). Because of the seeming importance of the battle, modern historians have explored motivations and explanations for this event (as well as the vision/dream) that accompanied it. For instance, the eighteenth-century Edward Gibbon saw Constantine's faith going through a slow development, while in the mid-nineteenth century Jacob Burckhardt perceived Constantine as a Machiavellian politician who used Christianity to build his power base. In this stimulating new book, Raymond Van Dam, no stranger to scholars of late antiquity, closely re-examines the primary sources for the event and argues that many authors changed and “suborned” their texts and that Constantine manipulated his own narrative of these events in reaction to those changes. As the title suggests, this book is about the reception, descriptions, and memories of the Battle of the Milvian Bridge—which Van Dam argues do not always convey what actually occurred.

The book starts with a timeline that is distinctively in reverse chronological order (foreshadowing Van Dam's argument about the constructed memories of our sources). Chapter one suggests “the past did not generate fixed memories; instead, memories constructed a past” (p. 9). In chapter two, Van Dam surveys medieval and modern echoes of Constantine and the Milvian Bridge (ranging from Clovis, to the Donation of Constantine, to Benito Mussolini's march on Rome). Chapter three treats pagan views of Constantine (such as those of Zosimus and Julian) and then introduces the major church historians who treat Constantine (Eusebius, Evagrius, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, and Rufinus). In chapter four, Van Dam develops the relationship between Constantine and the memory of the vision and battle as described in Eusebius's Life of Constantine (Vita Constantini). He suggests that “The account of the emperor's vision and dream in [Eusebius'] Life hence represented three distinct layers of particular circumstances: Eusebius' remembrance of Constantine's memories of events from long ago” (p. 57). The relationship between Constantine's memory and Eusebius's descriptions is developed further in chapter five, which stresses how Eusebius changed his story over the course of decades in the different editions of his Ecclesiastical History (Historia Ecclesiasticae). Chapter six argues that Constantine changed his memory over time and was influenced by Lactantius's description in his Death of the Persecutors (De Mortibus Persecutorum), the arch of Constantine, and the Latin Panegyric of 313. In chapter seven, Van Dam develops evidence from the poet Poryfrius, Constantine's interaction with the church over Donatism, the lost arch at Malborghetto, and the gigantic statue of Constantine in Rome, suggesting that “the emperor's memories about his vision, his dream, and the military standard were not a source for Eusebius' account but rather a consequence of hearing Eusebius' account of his monuments at Rome” (pp. 200–201). Chapter eight marks an end to the critical analysis of the sources, but it challenges the construction of a new “master narrative” because all these sources “had their own agendas, which they could promote,” and “the lesson should be the realization that our modern narratives are likewise constructed” (p. 219). In chapter nine, Van Dam presents an examination of Maxentius as an emperor trying to follow the principate model of the early empire to curry favor with the elite of Rome, but whose reign was the last gasp of that model. Finally, in chapter ten, Van Dam recalls the ancient Roman legend, preserved by Livy, of Horatio Cocles defending a bridge against an Etruscan invasion and hypothesizes that Maxentius may have been trying to emulate Horatius's defense of Rome when he marched out against Constantine.

This book is well researched and written in a dynamic fashion. Van Dam clearly knows the primary and secondary sources well. Although he cites the anonymous Origo Constantini Imperatoribus, he does not develop analysis of this unusual source from the late fourth or early fifth century, which describes the battle without religious implications. Van Dam could have wrestled more explicitly (p. 12, n. 18) with the argument of Peter Weiss that Constantine had only one vision (in 310) and that all the sources were describing that. Although clearly influenced by postmodernism, Van Dam writes so well that he can snare the reader. He is surely correct that Eusebius changed his description of the event in different editions of his works. The point that Constantine's own memory was shaped by Eusebius, Lactantius, and other sources is provocative, and criticism of sources is always useful to historians. It is not impossible that Lactantius, who had survived Diocletian's persecution and may have been at Constantine's court at the time of the event as the tutor of Constantine's eldest son, was reporting the official court line about the battle when he wrote two to three years later. Lactantius's description of Constantine's sign may have been an attempt to describe the Chi-Rho, but it is also similar to symbols of late Roman solar monotheism. The similarity may have been deliberate on Constantine's part, as recently suggested by H. A. Drake. So, perhaps we should view the interaction between Constantine and the primary sources as more of an intellectual dialogue than Constantine borrowing from them. In conclusion, Van Dam's book is a fascinating exercise that will provoke its own scholarly dialogue for years to come.

ROBERT M. FRAKES
Clarion University

FLORIN CURTA. The Edinburgh History of the Greeks, c. 500 to 1050: The Early Middle Ages. (The Edinburgh History of the Greeks.) Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press. 2011. Pp. vii, 365. $135.00.

This very learned and detailed investigation represents an advance in the field. Florin Curta has undertaken an ambitious and urgently needed study of a very difficult and controversial subject and historical era: "the emergence of the economic and social structures in Greece between c. 500 and c. 1050" (p. 8), and his book reflects wide-ranging reading and reflection. Curta has written extensively about ethnicity and demographic change in late antique and medieval southeastern Europe, and he knows the larger historical, archaeological, and numismatic contexts. While the paucity of written (literary and epigraphic) sources is one challenge, Curta introduces much valuable numismatic and sigillographic evidence, and the chosen chronological span is a reasonable one.

There are, however, some questions about other basics. The resulting synthesis of detailed information about Greeks in what is today's mainland Greece and nearby islands gives little attention to Greeks in Anatolia. Who were Greeks, and what was Greece? Not all Greeks were located in mainland Greece or the Aegean islands. There is no entry in the large index for Armenians, even though they intermixed with Greeks in Anatolia and the Balkans.

Among the book's major conclusions are that an economic contraction began ca. 620 C.E. (p. 97); identities were much more fluid than previously imagined, as Curta discusses similarities and differences in archaeological evidence associated with a range of social and ethnic groups; ethnicity was a measure of the cultural distance between inhabitants of the Byzantine Empire and barbarians (p. 295); there is no evidence for continuity between sixth-century aristocrats in Greece and "military men of the late seventh century" (p. 231); militarization of aristocratic identity and values went hand in hand with competition for imperial titles (p. 231); and nevertheless ethnic boundaries were important (p. 290).

Curta consciously investigates arguably the most contentious topic of Byzantine historiography in the past sixty-five years: aspects (in southeastern Europe) of the origins, nature, and chronology of the Byzantine "theme" system (military corps and their military corps districts). That entails risks. He also touches on another venerable and highly (almost equally) contentious issue: the continuity or non-continuity of the Greek people and the Greek language. Curta believes political and ethnic factors have been much exaggerated in the history of the Greeks for that period (p. 10). Although the answer may require a military explanation, Curta does not demonstrate mastery of the latest research and conclusions in this contested sphere. There is no historical consensus on military and social institutions in this poorly documented era. Military structures are not necessarily synonymous or identical with economic and social ones.

Curta argues for a new interpretation that emphasizes the role of the army, especially for sixth and seventh-century evidence (p. 92). He believes coin hoards are related to military movements in the late sixth century, but he is not a military historian; there are difficulties here. He offers a hypothesis, not a conclusively proven fact. Byzantine military institutions are especially obscure. Curta needs to explain military dimensions of his broader hypothesis more explicitly. The presentation is too vague and does not fit the latest scholarly interpretations of the Byzantine theme system. The military institutional technical term thema/themata or "theme" may not have appeared until the early ninth century. Curta, however, argues for the emergence of the "theme" of Hellas in the Byzantine Empire in the late seventh century (pp. 110, 125). The book contains many useful maps but, with the exception of the first two illustrations on fourth-, fifth-, and sixth-century fortifications in Greece, there are no maps of putative military administration and related structures in the territories he chose to investigate (pp. 276–277).

Curta draws conclusions from the absence of military revolts in (southeast European) Greece, but that phenomenon is explicable because the military forces stationed there during the period in question were not as strong as those in contemporary Anatolia, and so were not likely to prevail in any civil war.

Curta makes some surprising choices of editions and omissions of works, which detract from the otherwise impressive bibliography and footnotes, and he criticizes older Greek historiography and ethnography from the 1950s and earlier, although many of these works have been recognized as obsolete for decades. Yet Curta's book is now essential reading, even though it will probably not achieve consensus on disputed topics. There is no comparable book. Some of the challenges could have been remedied through better organizing and presenting of conclusions, and by avoiding lengthy references to archaeological evidence in the body of the text, which break up the exposition. As it stands, the book is too complex for assignment in most classrooms. The picture is imperfect, but it may be unrealistic to expect more.

WALTER E. KAEGI
University of Chicago

PAUL J. E. KERSHAW. Peaceful Kings: Peace, Power, and the Early Medieval Political Imagination. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. xvii, 313. $120.00.

"After the end of Rome's control over its western provinces in the fifth century, thoughts of peace occupied many minds. This book is about the changing character of that engagement and its place in the formulation of post-Roman political ideas" (p. 1). With these words Paul J. E. Kershaw introduces the central theme of his important book: how ideas about peace shaped kingship and royal ideology during the early Middle Ages. While earlier generations of historians often assumed that endemic violence and warfare characterized the so-called Dark Ages, Kershaw demonstrates "the sheer pervasiveness of the theme of peaceful rulership across the early medieval period" (p. 269). Kershaw's study makes significant contributions to scholarship on early medieval political culture by historians such as Janet L. Nelson, Gerd Althoff, and Timothy Reuter, and it also adds to recent work on the neglected topic of medieval peacemaking by Nicolas Offenstadt and Jenny Benham.

Kershaw's methodology focuses on a select group of early medieval authors and their contexts, paying close attention to "the vocabulary and the grammar of authority, its concepts, symbols, and vessels of meaning, as signs of rule and authority in 'real time'" (p. 12). Chapter one lays out the four interwoven ideological strands about peaceful rulership in the early medieval imagination: Judeo-Christian sources (Scripture, liturgy, and especially the writings of Augustine), legacies of the Roman Empire and the Pax Romana, indigenous northern European traditions, and authors' individual perspectives. Kershaw rightly emphasizes the key figure of Solomon as the typological model of peaceful kingship, thereby establishing a theme that runs throughout his study. Chapter two surveys the post-Roman successor kingdoms and explores how individual rulers and their courts (Vandal, Burgundian, Ostrogothic, papal, Visigothic, Merovingian) invoked the ideology of peace to legitimize their regimes and win the support of Roman populations. "When we hear the earliest generation of post-Roman rulers speak to each other, they often speak . . . about peace" (p. 92).

Chapters three and four constitute the core of the study: the ideology of the rex pacificus in the Carolingian eighth and ninth centuries. Here Kershaw covers much well-known ground (e.g., the Admonitio generalis, mirrors of princes, Alcuin, Ermoldus, Hincmar), but his focus on the pervasive theme of peace yields new perspectives and insights. While the ideology of peaceful Solomonic kingship already circulated around Charlemagne, it was under his son Louis the Pious that it moved to the center stage of Carolingian political thought. The fifth and final chapter crosses the Channel to Anglo-Saxon England and includes discussions of Bede, the First English Ordo, and the Old English translations from the reign of King Alfred. In a brief conclusion, Kershaw considers the enduring legacy of this ideology of peaceful kingship for the German Ottonian and Salian emperors.

There is too little space in this review to do justice to the many strengths of Kershaw's stimulating book, so a few highlights will have to suffice. Kershaw writes with clarity, verve, and memorable bon mots, and his footnotes demonstrate an impressive command of the scholarship. While he offers many good discussions of well-known early medieval authors, just as fascinating are his investigations into less well-known texts, such as the north African poetry of Dracontius, Ennodius' Vita of St. Epiphanius, Pope Nicholas I's letter to Khan Boris, and Bishop Wealdhere's "letter close" to Archbishop Berhtwald of Canterbury. This latter source highlights an intriguing subplot of Kershaw's book that deserves further research: the "continued importance of bishops as diplomats and peacekeepers in the post-Roman west" (p. 243).

It is inevitable that one has a few criticisms for a book of such ambitious scope. I found myself wishing for a more thorough consideration of the influence of Roman imperial ideas about peace, not only of the bygone pagan empire, but also of contemporary Byzantium. More generally, Kershaw leaves unresolved the fundamental question of whether this pervasive ideology of peace had any real impact on the political behavior of kings or if it was a mere fig leaf to cover the tough realities of power politics. Here a more sustained analysis of diplomacy and peace treaties could have been helpful. Kershaw does offer discussions of specific treaties such as Andelot (587), Strasbourg (842), and Alfred's treaty with Guthrum (ca. 878), but they are rather brief. Likewise, his short account of late Carolingian diplomatic summits (pp. 209–212) is a missed opportunity, since these meetings frequently invoked the ideology of pax et caritas amid high levels of competition and mistrust among kings.

In sum, Kershaw has written an important, learned, and thought-provoking book that should be of interest to all historians of early medieval kingship, political culture, royal ideology, and the post-Roman West.

ERIC J. GOLDBERG

Massachusetts Institute of Technology

WENDY DAVIES and PAUL FOURACRE, editors. The Languages of Gift in the Early Middle Ages. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2010. Pp. xv, 305. $95.00.

Most of the contributors to this collection of essays have been meeting to discuss early medieval history for three decades. During that time the group has published, under the editorship of Wendy Davies and Paul Fouracre, a collaborative volume on The Settlement of Disputes in Early Medieval Europe (1986), another on Property and Power in the Early Middle Ages (1995), and, with several changes in personnel, the volume under review. Framed by Janet L. Nelson's introduction and Chris Wickham's conclusion, both of which are written on behalf of the entire group, nine substantive essays examine gifts in a wide range of early medieval settings, including Lombard Italy, tenth-century Iberia, Carolingian Francia, and Anglo-Saxon England as well as Latin Christendom, Byzantium, and the medieval Islamic world generally. The main focus is on gifts to God and churches in the Latin West or the Byzantine East, although several essays treat gifts to and from kings and other lay people. Eight essays concern textual representations of gifts and one investigates images of gift giving.

Almost all of the essays reinforce at least one of the general arguments explained in the introduction and conclusion: first, Marcel Mauss was right in arguing in his Essai sur le don (1925) that "gifts represented, and (as one would say now) participated in the creation of, a social relationship and that sales did not" (p. 246). Second, although "the whole point about gifts is that one does not know exactly what will be returned (or, often, when) . . . gifts remain a main element in the construction of social bonds" (pp. 258–259). Third, early medieval gift giving coexisted with other forms of exchange, notably buying and selling (p. 5), which was "in ideal-typical terms antithetical [to it]" (p. 245). Fourth, although "gift-exchanging oiled the wheels of power at all levels" (p. 249), Pierre Bourdieu's critique of Mauss underestimated the role of gifts in "the construction of social bonds" and exaggerated the degree to which gifts were manipulated by the powerful for the purpose of dominating others (pp. 258–259).

In "Giving to God in the Mass: The Experience of the Offertory" (chapter two), David Ganz uses a study of the texts associated with the offering of bread and wine at the altar during Mass to show that "the altar became a privileged setting for gifts to God and to his church, because it was also the setting for the commemoration of God's gift to mankind: the sacrifice of the body of Christ which he had enjoined all Christians to share in" (p. 18). Ganz further argues that because gifts to churches also were made on the altar and therefore assumed the same status as offerings of bread and wine, the very large gifts that the rich made to churches were viewed with unease by early medieval writers, who worried that they disrupted the community that the Eucharist presupposed (pp. 31–32).

Through an analysis of donor images in Byzantine art with particular reference to mosaics at Hagia Sophia, Leslie Brubaker's essay, "Gifts and Prayers: The Visualization of Gift Giving in Byzantium and the Mosaics at Hagia Sophia" (chapter three) argues that, at its most explicit, the visual language of giving to Byzantine churches "frequently forms part of a process of supplication to divine figures, and presumes a counter gift." At the same time, however, she points out that "the counter gift, the granting of prayers, is there (as indeed elsewhere in society) not necessarily certain" (p. 61).

By comparing Bede's stories about early gifts to Wearmouth and Jarrow in his Historia abbatum (ca. 716) with two other texts describing gifts to the same abbeys, Ian N. Wood's "The Gifts of Wearmouth and Jarrow" (chapter five) identifies several contested features of gift culture in seventh- and early eighth-century Northumbria. Of particular interest is his finding that Ceolfrid, an early abbot of this twinned pair of monasteries, found ways of evading his "obligations of reciprocity" to his benefactors (p. 107). Rosemary Morris treats the theme of reciprocity from a different perspective in "Reciprocal Gifts on Mount Athos in the Tenth and Eleventh Centuries" (chapter eight), which shows, inter alia, how the language of gift giving (e.g., the representation of the gift as having been "freely given") could be manipulated in such a way as to represent as gifts what were essentially sales (p. 183).

Fouracre, in "The Use of the Term beneficium in Frankish Sources: A Society Based on Favours?" (chapter four), argues that "the granting of beneficia should be understood in the wider context of gift exchange," because it promoted "social bonding" and the exercise of political power every bit as much as gift giving did (p. 65). In this respect, his argument—which merits much closer attention than a short review permits—is neatly complemented by Nelson's discussions of the gifts made at Charlemagne's annual assemblies in "The Settings of the Gift in the Reign of Charlemagne" (chapter six), where she maintains that "what was on display [at these gatherings] was not just gifts but the relationships they made and symbolized" (p. 146).

Whereas several of the contributors emphasize the element of uncertainty in early medieval gift giving, Wickham's exceptionally well-theorized study of the launegild in "Compulsory Gift-Exchange in Lombard Italy, 650–1150" (chapter nine) examines a type of transaction in which it was certain that a gift would be made in return for a counter gift. Defining the launegild as "a compulsory counter gift, without which a gift was invalid and could be revoked" (p. 194), Wickham rejects the plausible-sounding view that only gifts exchanged for a token launegild were veritable gifts, whereas a gift exchanged for a valuable one was essentially a sale; instead, he argues that the insistence on using “gift imagery for what were normally not very ‘gifted’ transactions” was a sign of how much importance the parties placed on invoking the “social relationships” associated with every gift made in return for a launegild (p. 215).

In “When Gift is Sale: Reciprocities and Commodities in Tenth-Century Christian Iberia” (chapter ten), Davies shows that of 2,140 property transactions from tenth-century northern Iberia (excepting Catalonia), 1,085 were recorded as gifts and 912 as sales (pp. 222–223, 235). This statistical breakdown offers good grounds for Davies’s argument that gifts were clearly distinguished from sales, that countergift was clearly distinguished from price (p. 225), and that these two radically different modes of exchange coexisted in the societies under consideration. The stark opposition between gift and sale is qualified, however, by her finding that “between these two poles . . . there were many different kinds of transaction” (pp. 229, 235).

Because the contributors to this volume contest many conclusions of previous writers on medieval gift giving, their own conclusions are likely to be controversial, particularly when they are explicitly or implicitly based on debatable assumptions about gift giving itself and about the interpretation of gift language. Nevertheless, even the book’s critics will readily acknowledge that the contributors’ learned, well-argued essays have done a great deal to reinvigorate the study of medieval gift giving.

STEPHEN D. WHITE
Emory University

EUROPE: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN

ELISHEVA CARLEBACH. Palaces of Time: Jewish Calendar and Culture in Early Modern Europe. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 292. $35.00.

Elisheva Carlebach is a historian who succeeds in re-fashioning herself in every scholarly project she undertakes. In her first book she reconstructed the career of a zealous heresiarch pursuing Sabbatian deviants. Through the prism of his life and thought, she was able to offer a coherent picture of the controversies associated with the messianic figure Shabbetei Tsevi in the first half of the eighteenth century. In her second book, she plunged into the personal experience of Jews who converted to Christianity in early modern German lands, unearthing and describing systematically a vast conversion literature hardly examined by earlier scholars. In the present volume, she moves away from heretics and converts to explore an essential feature of normative Jewish life in early modern Europe, especially in central Europe: the Jewish calendar and instruction manuals (sifre evronot) for determining the calendar.

As Carlebach argues eloquently in this handsomely produced volume, calendars offer a rich source for Jewish cultural history in their merger of personal, sacred, and civil time. When examined carefully, they reveal the obvious but also subtle tensions between the need for economic and political integration with the religious need for separation that marked Jewish life for centuries. With their proliferation in the early modern period due to the printing press, calendars also provide an excellent case study of the transformation of Jewish culture through the agency of print along with the stubborn persistence of written manuscripts often accompanied by colorful illuminations.

Carlebach is not the first to explore the history of the calendar in Jewish history. The early history has been studied by Sacha Stern (Calendar and Community: A History of the Jewish Calendar, Second Century BCE–Tenth Century CE [2001]) among others. But Carlebach is the only recent scholar of early modern Jewish history to devote an entire monograph to this subject and to demonstrate decisively how calendars illustrate and enrich our understanding of Jewish culture in this particular era. She surveys the place of calendars and their evolution in medieval Christian and Jewish societies, describes the politics of calendars surrounding the reform of the Julian calendar, and demonstrates how print transformed a relatively esoteric pursuit into a mass medium. Her chapter devoted to the various manuscript “stand-alone” books copied long after the first printing of Hebrew books is especially striking. She is particularly sensitive to the implicit messages in both text and illustration: the need to underscore the antiquity of the Jewish calendar, to express nostalgia for a lost past, and to polemicize and respond to tropes of Christian culture. Her chapters on the marking of Christian time in Jewish calendars and the recording of market and fair days amply demonstrate the embeddedness of her sources in the culture of northern Europe. She also demonstrates how calendars uniquely reveal forgotten Jewish practices and folkways such as the caution not to drink noxious water during the equinox and solstice.

There is little to criticize in this highly original book. One might have hoped for a more extended treatment of the relationship between calendar study and the larger Jewish engagements in the study of the natural world, astronomy, and astrology. Surely the pious study of the laws of calendration provided incentives to some Jews to pursue the study of the heavens, especially in early modern times. One might also quibble about the lack of clarity regarding the calendar’s reach. Was the explosion of Jewish calendar production a phenomenon of early modern Jewish culture as a whole or was it primarily restricted to German lands? Carlebach offers some examples of calendars and sifre evronot composed outside of Germany, but she focuses primarily on the German lands, and most of her examples, especially the artistic manuscript books, originated from there. Was there something in this particular Jewish community that generated such creativity in comparison with southern and eastern Europe? Since rabbinic culture in the German lands in the early modern period was dwarfed by that of the Jewish communities to the East, the author's emphasis on German calendar production requires more explanation.

Carlebach's epilogue contains some tantalizing indicators of the importance of calendar study beyond the early modern era, particularly in the interventions of modern luminaries such as Lazarus Bendavid, Leopold Zunz, and Joseph Perl. Surely these pages invite future study of the entanglement of calendars with the concerns and ideologies of modern Jews. By excavating a vital source of Jewish creativity in the early modern period, Carlebach makes a major contribution to scholarship of this era. In this insightful and attractive book, she demonstrates once again her originality and freshness as a master historian who opens up new vistas of learning and provides new insights into the Jewish past.

DAVID B. RUDERMAN
University of Pennsylvania

ARNOUD S. Q. VISSER. Reading Augustine in the Reformation: The Flexibility of Intellectual Authority in Europe, 1500–1620. (Oxford Studies in Historical Theology.) New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 240. $74.00.

This learned and engaging book explores the reception of Augustine in the early modern world across confessional and geographical boundaries. It is divided into three main sections, which deal respectively with the production, circulation, and consumption of Augustine's texts. In the first part, Arnoud S. Q. Visser examines the conceptualization and production of the first three major editions of Augustine's opera omnia: the 1505–1506 Amerbach edition, the 1528–1529 edition supervised by Erasmus, and the 1576–1577 Antwerp edition produced by a team of Catholic theologians of the university of Leuven. As for the circulation of Augustine's texts, Visser chooses to address it by analyzing two specific sets of tools: indexes and bibliographies on the one hand, and anthologies and epitomes on the other hand. Visser's detailed and lively examination of these tools casts new light into how different readers read and understood Augustine. In the final part of the book, on the consumption of Augustine, Visser employs two different strategies. First, through a fascinating examination of how some readers (including Thomas Cranmer, Peter Martyr Vermigli, and William Laud) annotated Augustine's printed texts, Visser shows how Augustine's arguments were interpreted, re-framed, and modified to suit distinctive intellectual and theological agendas. In this manner, as Visser puts it, studying the appropriation of Augustine from the readers' perspective becomes an "exercise in intellectual ventriloquism" (p. 138) that illuminates important aspects of the political and theological debates in post-Reformation Europe. Second, Visser shows how Augustine was used in the early modern confessional and political debates by analyzing two case studies: the Baianist controversy in Catholic Leuven, and the Arminian controversy in Protestant Leiden.

In its author's intentions, the book has three main aims. First, it seeks to "systematically ground Augustine's reception in the history of reading and the material culture of books and manuscripts" (p. 6). Second, it seeks to show the complex role that Augustine's theology played in post-Reformation confessional and political debates. Last, Visser argues that by examining how readers received and, in some cases, recreated Augustine, we can acquire "a more advanced understanding of the uses of intellectual authority in the early modern period" (p. 7). Visser's book brilliantly carries out the first of its intended aims. Through an erudite, penetrating, and insightful analysis of both the printed editions and the manuscript notes on Augustine's texts, Visser successfully integrates manuscript culture and book culture and reassesses the role of humanist scholarship in the confessional polemic. In line with the scholarship of Irena Backus, Simon Ditchfield, and Anthony Grafton, Visser's book demonstrates that the confessional pressure did not hamper but indeed "actually promoted new scholarship, sharpened critical awareness, and refined philological and historical method" (p. 137). When it comes to the broader question of the reception of Augustine in the theological and political debates, however, the book leaves something to be desired.

Scholars of early modern religion and politics have long been aware of the great flexibility with which Augustine and other authorities were stretched to suit different confessional and political agendas, and certainly Visser's engagement with the reception of Augustine cannot be exhaustive, given the scope of his work. Nevertheless, some of the examples that Visser chooses could have been explored in greater detail. For instance, what Visser calls the "confessional neutrality" of the Leuven edition of Augustine cannot simply be explained by the commercial need of the publisher to produce an edition with a broad appeal, or by the "moderate Catholic culture" and the political situation of the Catholic Low Countries in the 1570s (p. 59). In addition to these factors, Visser could have provided a fuller examination of the specific theological debates within the Catholic community in the Low Countries. Also, in this part of his book Visser might have provided a more detailed discussion of the complex attitude that different constituencies of post-Tridentine Catholicism had toward Erasmus's philology and theology. The lack of attention to theological specificity returns in the part of the book devoted to explaining the different faces of Augustine as they emerged in the Baianist controversy. Visser argues that Cardinal Robert Bellarmine engaged with Augustine by emphasizing "Augustine's exemplary virtues as a saint and fighter of heresy" (p. 125), as opposed to Michael Baius, who, in response to the Protestants, emphasized Augustine's theology of grace. In reality, however, the relationship between Bellarmine and Augustine was much more complex than that: it involved the very core of the Jesuits' peculiar understanding of the relationship between grace and free will with respect to the rest of the Catholic world. All this, however, should in no way detract from the value of the book, which makes an important contribution to the history of reading and the material culture of books and manuscripts and to the significance of the relationship between erudition and confessional polemic in post-Reformation Europe.

STEFANIA TUTINO
University of California,
Santa Barbara

ULINKA RUBLACK. Dressing Up: Cultural Identity in Renaissance Europe. New York: Oxford University Press. 2010. Pp. xxi, 354. $55.00.

Ulinka Rublack's handsomely produced book is the latest in a series of scholarly works on European material culture that focuses on clothing and costume. Rublack contributes a new and needed dimension to the dialogue on early modern dressing practices. What is interesting and valuable here is that the author focuses her attention not on Italian or French or Spanish or English clothing and costume, which have a rich scholarly history beginning in the late twentieth century, but rather on the lands of the Holy Roman Empire in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, which she identifies as Germany. This work is an important contribution and an expansion of current scholarship that exposes the sartorial crisis of identity experienced during the time from European contact with the New World to the Protestant Reformation and beyond, thus taking the reader further temporally than previous studies of pre-modern clothing and costume have done. It demonstrates a breadth of historical research with literary value and accessibility. Rublack employs a social-science approach that has value for historians. Copious images (156 full-color illustrations of paintings, woodcuts, lithographs, and photographs of costume, and even a 1611 dollhouse) grace the pages of each chapter and make for an elegant presentation. Those enamored of visuals will be gratified by the book's offerings.

But how to write about dress coherently, providing a sense of the meaning of self-representation in sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Europe, and of the sartorial effects of the internationalization of contact, without overwhelming the reader? The author's long introduction ranges widely from twelfth-century Italy to seventeenth-century France, and includes eighteenth-century England, the Ottomans, and the Japanese, before finally focusing on the Germanic peoples after the opening of the New World. Here Rublack, like other scholars of European material culture such as Raffaella Sarti (Europe at Home: Family and Material Culture 1500–1800 [2002]), Jerry Brotton (The Renaissance Bazaar: From the Silk Road to Michelangelo [2002]), and Susan Mosher Stuard (Gilding the Market: Luxury and Fashion in Fourteenth-Century Italy [2006]), is overly broad, including too many facts, sources, and varieties of consumer goods for consideration. There are so many random (but interesting) connections initially made without developing a clear thesis that a coherent line of argumentation can be difficult to discern. This is frustrating for a specialist. Rublack's conclusion that it had become possible in early sixteenth-century Germany "and in this society alone, to believe in the importance of images" (p. 28) is difficult to defend, given the nature of the evidence she presents.

Chapter two does narrow its focus to one contemporary compendium of images, Matthaus Schwarz's unique sixteenth-century Book of Clothes, which begins with painted depictions of a young Schwarz, first naked and then wearing various ensembles from youth to old age. Rublack claims that a new "very particular sense of personhood" emerges at this time and place, where urbane men began to compile books not only of European costumes but also of those worn in lands recently discovered by explorers. One wonders whether this was perhaps a way of containing and controlling a violently expanded consciousness by organizing people by location, occupation, and gender (not necessarily in that order) for their own personal delectation.

Chapter three addresses the conundrum of how newly Protestant clergy attempted to design a proper costume that would distinguish them sartorially from Catholic clerics. While Martin Luther opined early on that clothes should not matter at all, a few years later he sported a red cloak, and the city of Wittenberg presented him with precious cloth and a gown of "purpur" (p. 97). Admitting that images from printed popular propaganda targeted primarily the papacy, Rublack writes that "it was less clear . . . how Protestants themselves should think about clothes" (p. 91).

Chapter four moves to investigate the ways in which "national" dress for an as-yet unformed German state could be conceived (this in an area of Europe that was struggling to show refinement in clothes without falling into the so-called "effeminacy" of Italian, French, or Spanish courtiers) while still demonstrating cosmopolitan tastes. How did a German present himself as an honorable person without reaching too far back into his humble past? This investigation is interesting and engaging. Rublack's primary text is Hans Weigel's 1577 Trachtenbuch (Book of Costumes), but she deals with multiple sources. At one point the author problematically uses woodcuts from Wolfgang Lazius's 1572 overview of how various nations dressed (De aliquot gentium migrationibus) as simple illustrations for humanist Conrad Celtis's 1498 Germania generalis, which tried to craft a patriotic sense of what it is to be German, without explicating the images themselves.

Chapter five takes up German images of the exotic, or the "other" compiled by a range of sixteenth-century travelers, including but not limited to Christoph Weiditz's Trachtenbuch (Book of Costumes), and the unpublished costume book of Sigmund Heldt, which Rublack characterizes as "an unparalleled example of early European ethnographic observation" (p. 187). She includes an explanation of the complex structure of the Holy Roman Empire and its necessarily convoluted marketplace politics and practices. The reader is thus thrust into various ancillary (albeit interesting) topics that are tangential to dress. Germans are pictured as fundamentally honest, non-judgmental citizens of a newly enlarged world. The author seems eager to portray them as virtuous participants in an expanded European consciousness that did not judge the “others” found in exotic cultures but rather portrayed them as dignified human beings worthy of respect. Here, Rublack neatly packages an emergent German-ness, proud of its past but scrambling mightily to find a more cosmopolitan future within the larger, more urbane European milieu that it hoped to join.

Chapter six focuses on the Behaim family of Nuremberg, specifically on two of three brothers (Friedrich and Paul) studying away from home in Altdorf and Leipzig whose letters home begged for cash, not only for beer but also to purchase new clothes. Rublack employs Steven Ozment’s Three Behaim Boys: Growing Up in Early Modern Germany (1990), correspondence reminiscent of Florentine Alessandra Strozzi’s letters to her exiled sons. But why devote an entire chapter to it, especially as chapter seven, on “Bourgeois Taste and Emotional Styles,” also draws on Behaim correspondence to describe long-suffering mother Magdalena’s urban shopping tastes? These two shortish chapters on consumption could have been combined to good effect.

The book concludes with a long and unwieldy epilogue that touches on at least a dozen new topics related to clothing, consumption, and the marketplace. Again the reader swims in too much information. Among other things, Rublack claims that sumptuary legislation has been woefully understudied (p. 265), a conclusion not borne out by current scholarship. Contemporary scholars have been writing about this and other aspects of the history of dress for over thirty years now, beginning in 1981 with Jacqueline Herald’s Renaissance Dress in Italy 1400–1500 and continuing with Stella Mary Newton’s The Dress of the Venetians, 1495–1525 (1988), Daniel Roche’s La culture des apparences: Une histoire du vêtement, XVII^e–XVIII^e siècles (1989), and my own Dressing Renaissance Florence: Families, Fortunes, and Fine Clothing (2002). In 2012 there is no doubt that clothing practice is a valuable area of historical study.

Rublack’s intended audience is not exclusively the student or focused historian of dress, costume, and material culture. She is apparently aiming at a larger readership that includes the interested layperson, who will be entertained and engaged by the frequent digressions she allows herself on topics ancillary to dress, and dazzled by the richness of her visual presentation.

CAROLE COLLIER FRICK
Southern Illinois University, Edwardsville

Urs App’s book offers an account of eighteenth-century European (mostly French) thinkers who wrote on the religions and philosophies of Asia east of the Indus River, particularly the attempt to fit Hinduism and Buddhism into an overarching history of culture. The seventeenth century had seen a certain amount of European engagement with Arabic and Persian texts, and by 1700 there was a Jesuit-fueled explosion of interest in China (especially Confucius). It was during the eighteenth century, however, that the degree of European engagement with Indian textual traditions saw the greatest growth, from almost nothing at the century’s beginning to, by its end, the work of William Jones and others on the connection between Sanskrit and Greek. App’s argument mirrors that of the Enlightenment tradition in European Indology that he reconstructs. Enlightened thinkers from Voltaire onward used Indian ancient texts to “relativize” Christianity as part of an emergent comparative history of religion; App sees Indology as playing a key role in the creation of a non-Biblical universal history. This, App argues, is what cleared the ground for the nineteenth century’s “modern” Orientalism, a set of specialist fields distinct from Christian theology.

The chapters are organized as a series of case studies of a range of authors, many of them armchair travelers reliant for their Orientalist learning on the publications of more specialized scholars (mostly missionaries). Such writers sought to fit the newly available Asian philosophical texts into speculative genealogies of culture, arguing, for example, that what we now term Hinduism was really an “exoteric” form of what we now term Buddhism, that some Chinese Buddhist texts were really translations from the Vedas, and so on. These “key-to-all-mythologies” arguments built upon and transformed a much older comparative tradition. The Christian tradition had, since the Church Fathers, looked for the “figures” of a primitive revelation (or prisca theologia) in pagan religions, as evidence of the truth of Christianity. Eighteenth-century freethinkers used the same comparative structure to draw the opposite conclusion that Christianity was a local variant on older Eurasian mythologies. This broad narrative, familiar enough in Enlightened historiography, is fleshed out at length through App’s chapters on Voltaire, Bartholomaeus Ziegenbalg and Mathurin Veyssi re de La Croze, Denis Diderot, Joseph de Guignes, Alexander Ramsay, John Zephaniah Holwell, Abraham-Hyacinthe Anquetil-Duperron, and Constantin Fran ois Volney. App returns to, and casts new light on, a set of questions that will be familiar to readers of Raymond Schwab’s La Renaissance orientale (1950), and of more recent studies by (among others) Roger-Pol Droit, Sylvia Murr, Will Sweetman, Ines G.  upanov, Raf Gelders, Brijraj Singh, and Guy G. Stroumsa.

App’s history of Orientalism is very much a history of ideas, in which there is little space given to the practices that make intellectual production possible. Indeed, App occasionally implies (e.g., p. xi) that reestablishing the intellectual framework for eighteenth-century In-dology is intended as a counterweight to the recent efforts to place European Orientalist discourse into social, political, and geographic contexts (efforts that might be traced back to Edward Said's work). By remapping the intellectual context for some discussions of India's ancient past by some prominent European writers, App's book may well redress one imbalance in the field, but in so doing, this approach neglects much of the colonial travel and textual exchanges—or what Miles Ogborn has called “the geography of writing”—that made the work of Voltaire and the like possible. Moreover, to imply, as App appears to do at various points (e.g., p. 186), that such an intellectual history refutes, rather than complements, the sociological approach, is something that some readers may feel requires further methodological discussion to establish.

URS APP. The Birth of Orientalism. (Encounters with Asia.) Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 2010. Pp. xviii, 550. $79.95.

App's book immerses its readers in the world of Enlightenment comparative religion and casts important new light on eighteenth-century European speculations about ancient Asian culture.

NICHOLAS DEW
McGill University

ALEXANDER C. T. GEPPERT. Fleeting Cities: Imperial Expositions in Fin-de-Siècle Europe. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2010. Pp. xvii, 398. $95.00.

World's fairs continue to attract considerable scholarly attention. Books about exhibitions tend to fall into one of three categories: deep analysis of a single exhibition; broad comparison of several exhibitions; or theoretical frameworks for analyzing the exhibition phenomenon. Alexander C. T. Geppert's book is a study of five imperial expositions in late nineteenth- and early twentieth-century Europe that blends all three approaches with mixed results.

Fleeting Cities begins and ends with broad theoretical suggestions. Drawing on cultural critics such as Georg Simmel, Werner Sombart, Henri Lefebvre, and Mikhail Bakhtin, Geppert conceptualizes exhibitions as “metamedia”: that is, “means of communication that encompass and incorporate other communicative technologies” including “medicalization, visualization and virtualization.” He also characterizes them as “knots in . . . a worldwide web,” “spaces of modernity,” or, in the words of late nineteenth-century German art historian Julius Lessing, “nodes in the course of history” (p. 3).

Exhibitions, Geppert observes, undermined both time and space by juxtaposing past and present, metropolitan and colonial. They were transitory—that is, they generally lasted only a year or so—but exhibited “frozen times” (p. 245) in that they offered snapshots of the societies being displayed, whether historical or contemporary. And yet, even though the majority of exhibition structures were planned for demolition after the event's closure, “this temporality did not hinder them . . . from acquiring meaning, founding traditions . . . [or] creating legacies” (p. 5). Another novel line of analysis is Geppert's claim that these exhibitions “resembled their surrounding metropolitan areas” and were often considered “cities within the city” (p. 221). Moving beyond the theories of Lefebvre, Geppert shows that “expositions had a catalytic effect on the city in which they were held” (p. 222), especially on transportation infrastructure, architectural construction, and global image.

Compared to space and time, however, people get short shrift. Although Geppert usefully distinguishes between five different groups of actors—initiators, organizers, participants, reviewers and observers, and visitors—their roles and responses emerge as a mélange, and at times a cacophony, of voices and visions. In typical postmodernist fashion, no one person's views are privileged over those of any other.

But this fits Geppert's broader view of exhibitions. He writes about the last of the five exhibitions he covers, the 1931 Exposition Coloniale et Internationale held in Paris: “It is a general feature of the exposition medium that . . . every attempt to find any kind of unified meaning is fatally flawed” (pp. 194–195). This theme recurs throughout the study, which also discusses the Berliner Gewerbeausstellung of 1896, the French Exposition Universelle of 1900, the Franco-British Exhibition of 1908, and Britain's Wembley Empire Exhibition of 1924–1925. Geppert does not explain, however, why he chose these particular five exhibitions. And because some were international while others more limited, the comparison is at times uneven.

The most valuable case study concerns the Berlin trade exhibition of 1896, the only significant exhibition held in Germany during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Not that businessmen and industrialists did not try to organize a grander and more international event, but the first attempt in 1882 fell victim to Otto von Bismarck's “personal objections as well as a general lack of support on [the] part of the government,” and a second attempt, a decade later, was abandoned due to Kaiser Wilhelm II's “brusque intervention” (p. 19) and his concern that Berlin could not yet rival Paris. Yet this is a very unsatisfying explanation. Failure of vision seems to have played a role, as did “provincial fear” (p. 33) and Germany's “comparatively marginal position as an imperial power” (p. 36), but much more likely was Germany's lack of a cohesive national identity, even after 1871. Geppert does not explore this possibility, however, perhaps because he is so dismissive of the “standard argument” that “expositions . . . were central instruments in the making of ‘national identities.’” In fact, Geppert finds “identity” to be a “conceptually vague, highly charged and worn buzzword . . . unsuitable for stringent historiographical analysis” (p. 14).

Yet in a subsequent chapter on the 1900 Paris Exposition, he does not contradict one contemporary observer, who claimed that “the principle of nationality . . . underlies the whole conception” (p. 85). In fact, the issue of nationalism and national identity haunts this book in complicated ways. As Geppert astutely points out, the Franco-British Exhibition of 1908 was characterized by opposition between the two nations, yet it occurred in the immediate aftermath of the signing of the Entente Cordiale and also implicitly pitted the two nations together “as racially similar rulers of their respective empires, in contrast to the indigenous cultures represented there in a supposedly faithful manner” (p. 133).

Still, one of the more important contributions of this book is to question the periodization of exhibitions. It is often assumed that there was a fundamental break after 1900. Geppert suggests instead that the medium’s apparent decline—which, in any event, is not borne out in attendance figures—had to do instead with a shift in its function, and therefore in the meanings ascribed to it. Yet even here there are contradictions, for he later writes that while “large-scale exhibitions continued” after 1900, “their classical period had come to an . . . end” (p. 100). Nonetheless, Fleeting Cities adds considerably to the literature on world’s fairs and opens up many new important areas of inquiry.

JEFFREY A. AUERBACH
California State University,
Northridge

MICHAEL S. NEIBERG. Dance of the Furies: Europe and the Outbreak of World War I. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press. 2011. Pp. 292. $29.95.

One of the best-known supposed facts of modern history is that the people of Europe cheerfully and with little reflection embarked on a course of mass suicide in the summer of 1914. Ever since the seminal publication of Jean-Jacques Becker’s study of France, a generation of historians working on national and local case studies have been trying to contradict, complicate, and nuance this story, but their findings have not until now been brought together in a single, full-scale transnational study. Michael S. Neiberg’s book constitutes both a synthesis of the scholarly literature and a thorough investigation of potential source material, published and unpublished.

The idea of mass “war enthusiasm” always rested on a shaky empirical foundation. In part it was a propaganda construct designed to marginalize internal dissent and impress allies and enemies. In part it was an intellectual construct drawing on ideas from social psychology about mass irrationality, best exemplified in the work of Gustave Le Bon. After the war it became a tool of various political and personal agendas, as an alibi for liberal politicians, as a mobilizing myth for the extreme right, and as self-glorification for pacifist dissenters.

Neiberg reveals the more complex reactions among a range of mostly middle-class contemporaries, both men and women, the latter usually neglected in studies of this topic. In order to understand reactions in 1914 he looks back to a series of diplomatic crises that began in 1905 and reminds us that there was no obvious reason why people should have believed that the July crisis would not lead via brinkmanship to the same sort of negotiated settlement that all its predecessors had. That it did not was essentially the decision of a handful of men in Berlin and Vienna. The result was for most of the European population a horrendous shock. Although nationalism was not an insignificant force in society in 1914, transnational identities of religion, occupation, intellectual affinity, and increasingly consciously internationalist movements such as feminism and socialism also mattered. It was the outbreak of war and the apparent defensive imperative to protect a way of life from an external enemy that generated nationalist sentiment. But Neiberg suggests that any re-imagining in terms of national unity proved too often to be a superficial burgfrieden, a temporary truce of the fortress that lacked substantive support. Even by the end of 1914, mass death and the onset of serious economic hardship in many countries were creating palpable discontent. This is not the standard argument of the illusions of 1914 giving way to disillusionment because Neiberg is skeptical that there was ever very much illusion.

This reviewer finds these arguments both congenial and convincing and therefore feels obliged to raise possible objections. Although the objection that this is revisionism for its own sake is unhelpful, it is important to remember there were some sparks that created the smoke of nationalist enthusiasm. A section of the European population, largely young, male, and from the upper social echelons does seem to have genuinely welcomed the prospect of war, and there were certainly individuals of both sexes and all classes who saw it as a release from peacetime frustrations. Furthermore, as the older classic studies of Roland N. Stromberg and Robert Wohl have shown, there was a very widespread positive response to war among artists and intellectuals. Many religious leaders saw a redemptive value in patriotic sacrifice as a reproach to materialism. It was even possible to view the war as useful catastrophe that would destroy the old order and usher in a socialist or nationalist millennium, the view of V. I. Lenin or Patrick Pearse. The relationship between these “ideas of 1914” and mass opinion remains unclear: they certainly did not cause the war, but they would play a role in shaping the way the war and the peace subsequently unfolded. The weight of Neiberg’s primary evidence is heavily toward French and English-language sources, including translations from other languages. There is potentially a problem here in that these “mature nationalities” may genuinely have been more pacific and less militant than others, even perhaps sated as established imperial powers. The version of German history that appears in English and French might in turn skew the record. Against this it should be said that most serious studies of Germany seem to confirm the limitations of popular enthusiasm.

There is an important corollary to this, which Neiberg identifies. One reason that almost all Germans after 1919 were so embittered by the accusation of war guilt is that they genuinely believed that they had gone to war reluctantly and for defensive purposes. This was not a false memory but an accurate one for most people. At the same time the Entente powers were correct in insisting on primary German government responsibility for the war that had inflicted such devastation. The real irony of Versailles was that it was the combination of these two rights that made a wrong.

ADRIAN GREGORY
University of Oxford

WILLIAM PHILPOTT. Three Armies on the Somme: The First Battle of the Twentieth Century. New York: Alfred A. Knopf. 2010. Pp. xiii, 631. $35.00.

British and Australian historians of World War I have long perpetuated a tradition begun by British wartime commanders like Douglas Haig and Hugh Trenchard: concentrating on the British experience to the exclusion or denigration of that of other powers, in particular their French allies. William Philpott has studied the experience and evolution of the British, French, and German armies on the Somme, which he terms the first industrial battle of attrition and materiel of many to follow in two world wars. He concludes that the Somme, rather than the sacrificial and wasteful bloodbath that historical accounts often portray, in fact constituted an Allied victory. The French Army waged the Somme battle successfully, and under the tutelage of French General Ferdinand Foch, the British Army, bloodied but unbowed, developed into a capable fighting force. The mobilization of their empires assured them of the ability to continue this war of attrition. The German Army, by contrast, had smaller reservoirs of manpower and resources and suffered irreplaceable casualties and a blow to its morale from which it never recovered.

The author argues his interpretation in convincing detail and with attention to the battle and home fronts. Philpott acknowledges that attrition started at the battle of Verdun, which he labels the "prototype" (p. 92) and the "grotesque, co-dependent, conjoined twin" (p. 93) of the Somme. He praises Foch as the only general intelligent enough to conceptualize industrial war as a succession of prolonged attritional battles. He further credits the French Army with greater sophistication in the coordination of infantry with artillery and aviation, which the British Army would have to learn.

Philpott suggests that the initial sense of July 1 as an "incomplete success," because the British had broken into German lines if not through them, had a certain validity, despite the enormous casualties. The British offensives of early July, casualties notwithstanding, constituted "an essential stage in creating a professional army" (p. 231). The Western allies demonstrated their superiority in the defining feature of industrial battle—the power of artillery—and undermined German morale in the wartime struggle for moral ascendancy.

By September, the turning point of the Somme, the British Army had completed its apprenticeship and could best the "professional" German Army (p. 347). That Germany had lost the initiative was evident in the German High Command's retreat to the Siegfried Line, the aerial offensive against Britain, and, most critically, the desperate resort to unrestricted submarine warfare. The British and French had crushed Germany's confidence in its military supremacy. Foch had developed his operational scheme of a succession of grinding offensives that he would ultimately coordinate to defeat Germany in 1918.

The book is a refreshing revision of traditional interpretations of the Somme, although the author's concentration on the Somme to the near exclusion of its prototype or twin, the battle of Verdun, does pose some problems. Philpott marginalizes the importance of Verdun and particularly of French General Philippe Pétain, who developed allied infantry tactics for modern industrial war at Verdun and who early advocated the intensive use of artillery and aviation to support infantry. The book's subtitle further creates a logical conundrum. If Verdun and Somme were conjoined twins, the former providing the occasion for the initiation of attritional warfare and the latter a fulfillment of the former, why should only one be labeled the first battle of the twentieth century and the other virtually ignored? The answer lies in Philpott's observation late in the book that the Somme was "the British Empire's first great modern battle" (p. 459). The British bore the brunt of the Somme offensive, and in a war in which the French led the coalition, Philpott asserts, a "professional" German army was defeated by the "dogged determination" of British imperial forces and the "professionalism" of the French (p. 503).

American readers might reasonably question such a broad assertion in light of later American participation in the conflict. One might also quibble with Philpott's application of the term "professional" to the German Army, as all the armies engaged in the conflict of 1914–1918 were conscript armies with a core of professional officers. The German Army was certainly qualitatively superior to its peers, but, as Philpott correctly emphasizes, attrition eroded that superiority, while the Allied use of masses of artillery, airplanes, and tanks negated quality. Overall, Philpott's fine book makes a strong case for his assertion that in the struggle between Europe's industrial empires in 1914–1918, the Somme, of "seminal significance" in the conflict, was its "attritional fulcrum" (p. 542).

JOHN H. MORROW, JR.
University of Georgia

DAVID REDVALDSEN. The Labour Party in Britain and Norway: Elections and the Pursuit of Power between the World Wars. (International Library of Political Studies, number 50.) New York: I. B. Tauris. 2011. Pp. xxiv, 206. £56.50.

Socialists in the early twentieth century were often curious about their counterparts in other countries, seeking to learn from others' achievements in propaganda, organization, and policy. Historians, too, have made implicit comparisons between the fortunes of left-of-center parties, criticizing particular movements for their shortcomings or celebrating supposed cases of exceptionalism. More explicit attempts to write comparative histories of labor parties are less common. In this book, deriving from his doctoral thesis, David Redvaldsen adopts the comparative route to determine "what factors made for success for a Socialist party" (p. 1). The successful example here is the Norwegian Labour Party (referred to as the DNA), which came into office in 1935 and introduced a program of social reforms before the outbreak of World War II. Its experience is contrasted with that of the British Labour Party, which had gained two brief periods of minority government before a calamitous split in 1931 administered a setback to its electoral progress. The Labour Party in Britain spent the 1930s rebuilding itself, achieving a dramatic landslide in the 1945 general election.

The book is concerned primarily with the 1930s, explored through a series of electoral comparisons pairing the British general election of 1929 with the Norwegian election of 1930, 1931 with 1933, and 1935 with 1936. A paragraph on some aspect of a British campaign is followed by a paragraph on related elements in a Norwegian election, a rather mechanical approach that presents disorientating juxtaposition rather than encouraging reflective critique. It also underplays some fundamental differences between these two constitutional monarchies and their respective political landscapes. Norway enjoyed proportional representation and fixed-term parliaments; across Britain's predominantly single-member constituencies, the scale of the national vote often bore a very indirect relationship to the numbers of seats won, while the date of a general election was normally chosen by the ruling party.

The monograph is based on primary research, drawing mainly on campaign materials at a national level. It prioritizes propaganda over policy and electioneering over party organization, even though Redvaldsen recognizes in his conclusion that organization mattered, and that one of the DNA's advantages was its far greater density of membership across the country. The discussion concentrates instead on documenting the election campaigns, comparing literature issued and money spent. There are tantalizing glimpses of distinctive approaches, including the DNA's commitment to the spectacular in this age of rallies and theatrical mass politics. But a great deal goes unexplained, including—crucially—the nature of the opposition that each party faced.

Redvaldsen emphasizes an interest in rural votes as something both parties shared. Yet the differences were huge. Under the Norwegian constitution, he explains, two thirds of the seats were allocated to the countryside; fishing was a significant industry and the average farm was so small that the DNA could reasonably target farmers as the "little people" it pledged to represent. When describing the British Labour Party's approach, meanwhile, Redvaldsen tends to assume that rural voters were synonymous with agriculturists. In fact, the political challenges of the countryside for the British Labour Party were as much about distinctive political cultures and traditions and physical obstacles to organization and campaigning as they were about targeting a specific minority of the workforce. My assumption would be that, in parts of Norway at least, terrain, population density, and regional identities and customs would also have required certain adaptations from the DNA. However, the focus on central party campaigning and absence of local case studies produces a highly generalized impression. It is particularly disappointing that there is no discussion of rural Scotland, where fishing was a major feature of some local economies and patterns of land use had rather more in common with Norwegian experience. One might well ask why the DNA could make a successful appeal in rural Norway when there was no Labour presence to speak of in Orkney and Shetland.

It is difficult not to regard the book as a missed opportunity, since there is so little available in English on the history of the Norwegian Labour Party. Most readers will be dependent on Redvaldsen's account for a basic understanding of the Norwegian side of the comparison and may find themselves floundering as they attempt to gain a clear picture of the party's identity and experience during this period. In his introduction, Redvaldsen offers a useful and succinct discussion of the methodological challenges of comparative history. But his decision to eschew a contextual treatment of the two political nations at the beginning of the book was unfortunate. One needs to know much more about what Labour and the DNA did (or did not) have in common in order to understand the importance of their respective strategies in shaping political outcomes.

CLARE V. J. GRIFFITHS
University of Sheffield

QUENTIN SKINNER, editor. Families and States in Western Europe. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 211. Cloth $85.00, paper $29.99.

At the end of World War II, Europeans feared that the family, as much as buildings, factories, and governments, was in ruins. In 1946, British-American writer Alice Bailey alerted the American public about "those peculiar and wild children of Europe and of China to whom the name 'wolf children' has been given. They have known no parental authority; they run in packs like wolves; they lack all moral sense and have no civilized values and know no sexual restrictions; they know no laws save the law of self-preservation." Apocalyptic fears about the extinction of the European family proved to be unfounded, but they do reflect a constant theme in postwar European history. Such fears have inspired constant appeals to the state and civil society to "protect" the seemingly fragile bonds of kinship. And while the family has certainly survived the past sixty-five years, today's families would probably be nearly unrecognizable to Bailey and her contemporaries.

This new volume edited by Quentin Skinner offers a synthetic overview of these transformations, with a focus on the changing relationships among families, states, and civil society since 1945. The collection consists of a theoretical overview by David Runciman and eight national case studies. Most of the essays are based primarily on secondary literature rather than new archival research, but they provide a fairly comprehensive overview of major forces shaping European family policies over the past six decades, including changing patterns of female labor force participation, demographic trends and anxieties, reproductive politics, the influence of religion and secularization, and the rise of the neo-liberal state.

Many of the essays offer trenchant critical perspectives on both the history of the family and contemporary family policies in Europe. Sarah Howard highlights the ways in which France's much-vaunted "benevolent" family policy favors the wealthy and the middle class. Tony Fahey demonstrates that changing attitudes toward family, gender, and reproduction in postwar Ireland developed within the Roman Catholic Church rather than simply against it. Maria Ågren challenges the assumption that social entitlements or rights are a unique feature of postwar welfare states, offering a longue durée perspective on family policy in Scandinavia. Deborah Thom's essay on Britain highlights tensions between the mobilization of a sentimental ideology of family values by politicians and growing state support for free markets. Paul Ginsborg looks at the conflict between traditional Italian family structures and democratization. On the one hand, his essay echoes some of the outdated assumptions of modernization theory, namely that individualism and the nuclear family are automatically linked to democratization. On the other hand, he also notes that the Italian case demonstrates that there was no "automatic connection between industrialization and new family patterns," and that many of the most successful Italian enterprises are family-controlled to this day (p. 112).

The division of the book into national case studies has the advantage of underscoring the diversity of European approaches to family policy, but tends to understate the degree to which family life and policies have been shaped by forces and social movements that transcended national frontiers—including Second Wave feminism and the gay rights movement, the Roman Catholic Church, the rise of consumer societies, immigration, decolonization, and the Cold War. More explicit comparison to other parts of the globe (such as the United States, Asia, or Latin America) might also have highlighted what was distinctive about European family policies and politics during this period.

The absence of sustained treatment of immigration is particularly glaring, given that immigrant families have been so heavily pathologized by right-wing political movements over the past several decades. The contributors specifically miss the link between the unflagging pro-natalism of West European family policies in the postwar era and the underlying persistence of ethnic or racial conceptions of the nation. Adam Tooze thus argues that "Germany's current predicament highlights the fact that the reproduction of the German state in the most basic biological sense depends on the free choice by men and women to marry and procreate" (p. 82). In truth, the reproduction of the German state only relies on the willingness of men and women to marry and procreate to the extent that immigration is rejected as a solution to demographic imbalances.

The Cold War also makes only a brief cameo appearance in this volume. Tooze is the only contributor who analyzes the impact of the Cold War and the collapse of communism on family policies, arguing that a unified Germany gradually integrated former East German policies in support of working mothers into its own social welfare system. This more general absence raises the basic question of why Eastern Europe is excluded entirely from the volume. The very diversity of the cases included challenges the notion of a coherent "West European" model of family-state relations. While Cold War ideology certainly defined the evil of East European (and Nazi) totalitarianism in terms of the alleged absence of "private" family life in socialist societies, recent work has demonstrated that "private" family lives not only flourished in everyday life under late socialism but were actively promoted by socialist regimes looking to shore up their own flagging popular support. Without denying what was distinctive about East European family policies, it would be as revealing to compare the relationships among family, state, and civil society in Poland and Ireland or in Czechoslovakia and France as it is to compare Italy and the Netherlands. In any event, the family was certainly one of the primary objects of Cold War conflict, and the existence of the socialist "alternative" in the East shaped West European family policy more than these essays generally acknowledge.

Several essays could have benefitted from more explicit engagement with recent literature on the history of gender and sexuality in Europe. The authors tend to think about the history of the family primarily in terms of state policies affecting women and children. Men, however, also belong to families, and in the past six decades, state policies and civil society have dramatically shaped and transformed norms of masculinity and fatherhood. Likewise, heterosexuality generally appears to be a transhistorical norm in these articles. While several contributors (such as Howard) productively analyze public attitudes and public policy debates about gay adoption and marriage, the role of the state and civil society in reproducing heterosexuality is generally absent. Finally, some authors tend to treat the "public" and "private" spheres as real spaces rather than historically or discursively constructed ideals.

These issues aside, this volume could serve as helpful reading for undergraduate or graduate courses on the European family, and it offers useful contextual and historical analysis for anyone who seeks to understand the debate that continues to rage around the family in present-day Europe.

TARA ZAHRA
University of Chicago

WARREN JOHNSTON, Revelation Restored: The Apocalypse in Later Seventeenth-Century England. (Studies in Modern British Religious History, number 27.) Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell Press. 2011. Pp. xxi, 290. $99.00.

Although there have been many books and articles published in the last two decades on apocalyptic expectations in Restoration England, there has not been a substantial overview of the topic since Paul J. Korshin's "Queuing and Waiting: The Apocalypse in England, 1660–1750" in C. A. Patrides and Joseph Wittreich, editors, The Apocalypse in English Renaissance Thought and Literature (1984). Now Warren Johnston has written a book based on deep and wide research into the period and early modern apocalypticism in general. However, his wide reading in the secondary literature cohabits oddly with his insistence that apocalypticism in the late seventeenth century has been understudied and its importance underrated. Although this was true at one time, it has not been the case for many years.

Johnston's work focuses on the sectarian and political relevance of the apocalypse rather than the influence of the apocalypse on the literary and intellectual "big names" of the period. Newcomers to apocalyptic studies, particularly those without a Bible at hand, will benefit from his summary of apocalyptic scriptures, which summarizes the relevant texts in the Book of Daniel, Second Thessalonians, First John, and Revelation. An opening, densely footnoted chapter on "Conventions in Restoration Apocalyptic Interpretation" establishes that mainstream interpretation drew from the works of scholars Thomas Brightman and Joseph Mede. The dominant mode of thinking about the apocalypse was historicist, interpreting most of the prophetic schema as descriptions of the history of the church to the present day and extending to the near future; millenarian, expecting a thousand-year reign of the saints on earth after the second coming; and anti-Catholic, seeing the papacy as the destined enemy of true Christianity. Within this schema there was wide room for disagreement on particular issues, such as the exact timing of events or the role of the Turks. There were also minority viewpoints: "futurist," which assigned the fulfillment of most of the prophecies to the future, and "preterist," which claimed that the prophecies applied to the early church. None of this will be particularly surprising to historians of seventeenth-century apocalypticism, but Johnston's explication of the different positions is extremely detailed.

Three chapters deal with the apocalypse as used in Restoration radical nonconformity, moderate nonconformity, and Anglicanism respectively. Radicals drew hope and inspiration from the apocalypse in their plans to overthrow the Restoration government and inaugurate the reign of the saints on earth. Much discussion of apocalypticism in the period has focused on radicals, so Johnston's discussion of more moderate religious positions is very welcome. Moderate Dissenters, not sharing radicals' hopes for immediate overthrow of the Restoration order in church and state, drew hope from the apocalyptic prediction of the triumph of the saints, while not usually taking action to bring it about. Anglicans, most prominently the Cambridge Platonist Henry More, were able to use the apocalypse to buttress the Restoration order by, for example, identifying the "two witnesses" in Revelation, slain for their proclamation of the truth, as Charles I and Archbishop William Laud.

Two chapters deal with the apocalypse in relation to major political events, the Popish Plot crisis and the Glorious Revolution of 1688. Both incidents saw wide use of the apocalypse primarily in an anti-Catholic context. The "Popish Plot," the alleged conspiracy of Catholics to assassinate Charles II, was placed in a framework of Catholic plots against the true church that fit into the apocalyptic scheme. The accession of the Catholic King James II had obvious apocalyptic implications, and the revolution of 1688 was interpreted as a literal victory over the Antichrist. Anglicans as well as Dissenters interpreted the revolution in apocalyptic terms. The last chapter carries the story to the end of the century, finding substantial continuity with the pre-revolutionary period but also innovations such as a preoccupation with William III as a new Constantine and a growing interest in how French affairs fit into the chronological scheme.

This book is the product of wide reading in what are mostly obscure sources. (The book's enormous bibliography of both primary and secondary sources will be a starting place for researchers for years to come.) Sometimes Johnston's overall thesis gets lost in the analysis of obscure pamphlet after obscure pamphlet, and readers will wonder to what degree these pamphlets were actually read and what influence they had on people's thinking. The primary sources listed in the bibliography are exclusively printed works. Research in manuscript sources, such as sermon collections and spiritual diaries, would have strengthened the book by showing more evidence of how apocalyptic statements were received.

WILLIAM E. BURNS

George Washington University

GERALD MACLEAN and NABIL MATAR. Britain and the Islamic World, 1558–1713. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 335. $65.00.

Early modern English attitudes toward Islam, toward Muslims, and toward non-Muslims living in the lands of Islam all varied inconsistently over time and according to particular historical and regional contexts. Gerald MacLean and Nabil Matar have extensively and insightfully analyzed these English perceptions, revealing much of their complexity yet also tracing overall patterns by period, region, topic, and genre. In so doing, they enrich our understanding of English cultural history as well as English engagements with the religions and peoples of major parts of the Islamic world.

MacLean and Matar broadly differentiate English interactions chronologically and for each of three spheres of "Dar al-Islam"—literally, the abode of Islam (p. 123). For the western region of North Africa, English oral and published captivity narratives of piracy and forced or seduced conversion to Islam disproportionately fired the English imagination. Muslims and Islam in the Barbary Coast thus appeared most dangerous and threatening, even after 1640, when MacLean and Matar find a shift in English discourse from the oppressed victim to the heroic Christian captive. This transition also led to growing interest in English military conquest of the region.

For the Ottoman Levant, in contrast, the more sober and businesslike reports of merchants, diplomats, and consuls described a more tolerant Muslim society, although these accounts circulated less widely in England and thus had less effect on popular culture there. Still, the context of bloody Anglican-Catholic conflicts over theology and religious practice shaped English popular attitudes toward Islam, as well as toward the diverse Christian, Jewish, and other religious communities living in Islamic lands. In their efforts to find local allies against both Roman Catholics and Muslims, however, "English writers failed to recognize how fissured [Eastern] Christian communities were: Armenian, Coptic, Maronite, Melchite Orthodox, Greek Catholic, and Syrian Nestorians" (p. 162). Further, compared to England and the rest of Christian Europe, many cultures and religions coexisted within the Ottoman Empire, following their faiths with little conflict or suppression. Thus, in order to claim suppression by Islam and the terrible Turk, English literature evoked the Crusades or biblical antiquity in portrayals of the oppressed lives of Jews and eastern Christians in this region.

For Safavid Iran and Mughal India, which MacLean and Matar discuss less extensively, English accounts from the precolonial period show more uncertainty about religious identities and greater interest in commerce. Here, the relatively centralized coordination of the East India Company and the profit motive, MacLean and Matar argue, made Islam and Muslims less abstractly threatening in the English imagination. Overall, the authors show how uninformed the English (including those actually living in Muslim lands) remained about the doctrines of the various Islamic sects, even the basic differences between Sunni and Shi'ite.

In much of this fine book, the authors concentrate on especially significant or representative themes and topics. In one particularly fascinating section, they analyze the diplomatic and personal correspondence of Queen Elizabeth I with Moroccan kings, including Sherif of Marrakesh Mulay Ahmad al-Mansur (reigning 1578–1603), with Ottoman Sultans, including Murad III (reigning 1574–1595), and with Murad's wife and the future queen mother, Sultana Safiye (deceased 1605/1619). The rhetoric and even format of these letters adds a personal flavor to relations between the states. Later English monarchs, however, paid less attention to Muslim rulers and vice versa, with ambassadors from each side often receiving relatively little notice.

MacLean and Matar devote their final chapter to the cultural significance in England of imports from the lands of Islam. Coffee initially appeared in English public culture as Islamic and thus simultaneously tempting and dangerously foreign. Conversely, tobacco, originally imported by Europeans from the Americas, evoked similar attitudes in the Islamic world. Another section, "The calico wars," shows how this supposedly Islamic cloth, like other exotic material imports, entered English life through "importation, imitation, and invention, followed by domestication" (p. 214). The authors conclude by showing how the English assimilated Islamic turbans and Arabian horses. While, the effects of the small but growing number of Muslim people who began to live in England during this period do not receive much attention in this book, Matar has considered them in earlier works, most notably Islam in Britain, 1558–1685 (1998).

Through masterful use of a variety of original sources, including plays, books, pamphlets, archival records, and illustrations, MacLean and Matar make an innovative and persuasive argument. They demonstrate the diversity and complexity of English perceptions of both Muslims and Islam during this vital period in the development of English culture and its early relations with the peoples and religions of the Islamic world. A variety of scholars, students, and general readers will learn much from this accessible and well-informed volume.

MICHAEL H. FISHER
Oberlin College

JONATHAN SCOTT. When the Waves Ruled Britannia: Geography and Political Identities, 1500–1800. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. xvii, 227. Cloth $90.00, paper $32.99.

So much nonsense has been written about British insularity that Jonathan Scott's book comes as a welcome antidote. Too many historians mistake geography for destiny and fail to understand that insularity is a construct, no less powerful for being rooted in the minds of observers. Scott is fully aware of this pitfall and avoids geographical essentialism. He knows that the British discovered islandness late and have never really dissolved their identification with the continent to the east. The early modern period saw an intense struggle between insularists and continentalists, and these differences have never really been resolved, in part because an absolute distinction between islands and continents is unsustainable. Britain's geographical and historical identities have varied enormously over time, determined both by internal events and international conditions. Britons have located their mythic origins in various times and places, some quite landlocked, others watery.

Scott is dealing here with both imagined geography and myth history. He brings to his study a wealth of knowledge about the literature of the seas, exploration and travel accounts, cartography, geography, early marine science, sea fictions, and even the art of seascape. And, like his fellow New Zealander J. G. A. Pocock, he is familiar with Britain's Pacific as well as Atlantic legacies. Scott is as much concerned with metageographies as with spatial reality. His knowledge runs wide as well as deep. Readers will learn that the sixteenth-century English believed themselves to be the heirs not just of Athenians but of Phoenicians and Carthaginians. From the Greeks they adopted what Scott calls "maritime orientalism," which contrasted the freedom of island and coastal peoples with the despotism of the continental empires, starting with the Persians. Yet there have been long periods when the British thought themselves to belong more to land than sea. Like all seagirt peoples who live on both sides of the tide line, their relationship to the oceans has been ambiguous. Their claim to be a maritime people, a notion that gained strength in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, deserves the critical treatment Scott provides.

How did Britain finally come to settle on a maritime identity in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries? Scott's explanation is partly political and economic. The key turning point was the Civil War, which pitted a landlubberly gentry against seagoing merchants. The latter were encouraged by the example of the Dutch, a rival but also a model of seaborne empire. Britain was but one of several European coastal societies that developed a blue water orientation in the seventeenth century. At first it saw itself as archipelagic, but with Captain Cook's eighteenth-century discovery of isolated oceanic islands it began to see itself in analogous terms. The British turned their backs on Europe in the Napoleonic period, and the fantasy of a true island nation peaked in the early twentieth century. But in the wake of decolonization after 1945, Britain again became firmly tethered to Europe, defined by geographers as a continental, rather than an oceanic, island.

Historians familiar with conventional political history may have trouble following Scott's convoluted story. He manages to connect points in time, sometimes ancient and even prehistoric, that are not normally associated with one another. Maritime historians concerned with fisheries and blue water navies may also find themselves somewhat at sea in a study that is more concerned with ideas about the oceans than what actually went on in them. If Scott's temporal range is refreshing, so too is his geographical scope. He takes readers to New Zealand, which had its own version of maritime orientalism in its relationship with its continental other: Australia. What is missing, however, is an engagement with the recent conceptual literature about oceans, islands, and continents. Scott is familiar with Philip E. Steinberg's The Social Construction of the Ocean (2001), but he might have found additional insight in Martin W. Lewis and Kären E. Wigen's The Myth of Continents: A Critique of Metageography (1997) and Peregrine Horden and Nicholas Purcell's The Corrupting Sea: A Study of Mediterranean History (2000).

Nevertheless, this book is a very welcome addition to a growing British historiography that is less landlocked and parochial and much more relevant to this global era, when the seas have again attained a cultural, economic, and political importance that they seemed to have lost during the great era of continentalism in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Science has made the sea its final frontier, and there has been a move in both the humanities and social sciences toward the oceans. This is not just a revival of the old maritime history, one focused on fisheries and navies. The new marine history is less blue water than coastal in orientation and pays closer attention to that which connects rather than separates land and sea. The waters have been muddied, but we now have a clearer understanding of our terraqueous globe.

JOHN R. GILLIS
Rutgers University

STEPHEN CONWAY. Britain, Ireland, and Continental Europe in the Eighteenth Century: Similarities, Connections, Identities. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 342. $125.00.

Stephen Conway, already known for two excellent monographs on the domestic social impact of Britain's wars of 1739–1748, 1756–1763, and 1776–1783, episodes often evoking xenophobia and negative national stereotypes, here turns his attention to the positive contacts and affinities between the British Isles and continental Europe. He presents this study as a reaction against an orthodox insistence on British separateness and difference, citing H. E. Marshall's Our Island Story (1905) and recent attention to transatlantic and worldwide dimensions of British history; but most recent British historians, echoing a project of Irish or British engagement with the European Union, have urged the opposite and emphasized British cultural contacts or even indebtedness. To point this out is not to doubt the existence of continental connections; it is to highlight the methodological difficulties of weighing the alternatives.

Conway offers a necessarily selective approach, focusing on certain themes. His political scene is set by the constitutional legacy of the revolution of 1688, but for Conway this event did more to establish connections than to dictate divergence, a conclusion reinforced by an examination of foreign policy and those who conducted it. The notions of "the balance of power" and "the liberties of Europe" both had leverage. The French threat prompted not only a reactive sense of difference in the British Isles, but also a sense of involvement in the fate of a Europe threatened by French dominance. From an early date, contemporaries acknowledged that finance and trade were interconnected across Europe, however much transatlantic trade developed later. European manners (expressing the ideal of "politeness") were similarly shared in Britain and Ireland, not least by a copying of French models. Scientists and scholars addressed a European republic of letters. British and Irish Christians saw themselves as part of "a wider European Christian community" (p. 162). British merchants traded with Europe and British armies fought there far more than they did with and in the world beyond.

Yet in each area there were negative reactions. The Orange and Hanover dynasties were hailed by some but repudiated by others. The involvement in continental war and diplomacy that followed 1689 was matched by the emergence of an alternative "blue water" strategy of maritime self-sufficiency. French fashions in clothes and French food were condemned as well as imitated. Did material influences "make members of the elite and even middling ranks think of themselves as Europeans?" (p. 124), asks Conway; but he does not present evidence that the British and Irish in this period debated this question or reflected much on a reified "Europe." Notions of "popery," "tyranny," and "French fashions" were not facets of a single Europeaness. Occasional eighteenth-century schemes for a common currency, a common army, and a common parliament or diet loom large from a present-day perspective but were then impractical rarities. Among scholars and intellectuals, the decline of Latin as a shared language may have reduced the degree of international interchange seen in the seventeenth century. A common Christian hope did not prevent antagonism and even conflict not only between but within denominations, and since the Church of England was a church hardly represented on the continent, the potential for a sense of common cause, like that open to Catholics, was limited for Anglicans. Grand tourists often learned little of their host countries. Such evidence also features in this book, and for reasons of method a balance sheet is difficult to draw up: we should instead see exceptionalism not as a thing but an idea.

This is a careful, empirical book, preferring specific and quantifiable instances, especially in war, trade, and travel. It is full of fascinating evidence, widely culled from printed and manuscript sources, and is a salutary warning against ideas of British uniqueness. Although it presents areas of difference, it comes down on the side of Britain and Ireland having been "integral parts of Europe" (p. 2) engaged in a trend "to further European consciousness" (p. 135). But it might be doubted whether a positivist methodology best captures either affinity or distinctiveness: mentalité is a term mentioned only once; literature and the arts feature only briefly; politics appears more in discussions of constitutional history than political thought or law; and religion is dealt with in a separate chapter, handled in the same positivist tone. Conway has much interesting material to offer, but his can seem an external view that does not always capture the inwardness of things. He also concludes with the striking reflection that "links with the rest of Europe might have been more important for the Scots and Irish than for the English" (p. 294), a possibility that, if explored, might challenge the book's main thesis.

J. C. D. CLARK
University of Kansas

JAMES G. PATTERSON. In the Wake of the Great Rebellion: Republicanism, Agrarianism and Banditry in Ireland after 1798. New York: Manchester University Press. 2008. Pp. vi, 202. $84.00.

The Rebellion of 1803 occupies a strange place in most narratives of modern Irish history. On the one hand, the rebellion created one of the mythic set pieces of Irish republicanism, Robert Emmet's famous speech at the dock, which closed with a phrase memorized by generations of Irish students: "When my country takes her place among the nations of the earth, then and not till then, let my epitaph be written." At the same time, the rebellion has always seemed strangely isolated, a distant epilogue to the drama and violence of the 1798 Rebellion. It is not that recent scholarship has been silent on 1803: both Patrick M. Geoghegan and Ruán O'Donnell have published well-received biographies of Emmet in recent years. The biographical focus of these works, however, has meant that the popular links between the events of the 1790s and the Rebellion of 1803 have remained relatively unexplored. One of the chief virtues of James G. Patterson's well-researched monograph is that it makes significant strides toward closing that gap.

Rooted in a close study of the voluminous Rebellion Papers and the State of the Country Papers, this book charts the survival of popular radical political networks across Ireland after 1798. It is organized around three regional case studies, which illustrate the complex legacies of the United Irishmen and the Defenders in east Ulster, south Munster and Connacht, and south Leinster in the years following the failed rebellion. Patterson's close attention to the complexity of the local landscape in each of these settings allows him to challenge significant aspects of the established narratives of post-1798 Ireland. His strongest case is east Ulster, where the traditional view holds that Dissenters who had been active in the United Irishmen in the 1790s flooded into more conservative pan-Protestant associations in the aftermath of the sectarian tumult of 1798. While Patterson allows that some Presbyterians made this journey, his careful research shows that tensions between conservative Anglicans and Presbyterian radicals remained far too potent in Antrim and Down to talk about a simple Catholic-Protestant divide. Patterson's narrative features stories of men like Thomas Archer, a Presbyterian who deserted the militia prior to 1798 and fought with the republicans at the Battle of Ballymena. Using court records, Patterson reconstructs Archer's post-rebellion career as the leader of a Presbyterian Defender cell that remained active in the field for nearly two years after the republican defeat. Archer's anti-loyalist career suggests that there was widespread disaffection for the new conservative regime in east Ulster, feelings that would only dissipate through coercion, emigration, and, above all, time. By focusing on these hitherto ignored narratives, Patterson illustrates the complexity and instability that characterized the north of Ireland in the aftermath of the rebellion.

Patterson's examinations of south Munster and Connacht and south Leinster also suggest that radical politics survived 1798 at a popular level, often coalescing with agrarian concerns and/or social banditry. A thin source base (particularly for south Munster and Connacht) means that his assertions often are more suggestive than authoritative, but that does not make his pioneering research less valuable. What Patterson shows is that radical political networks survived in places like Cork, Galway, and Wexford in hybrid forms, sharpening anti-tithe agitation, giving impetus to anti-state "gangs," and transforming reactive protest into more violent and aggressive expressions. In tracing the legacies of the United Irishmen into different forms of collective protest, Patterson's work persuasively calls for a reassessment of the politics of popular protest in pre-famine Ireland.

There are certainly problems here. As noted above, the thin source base for the material on Connacht and south Leinster makes Patterson's arguments for those areas more primers for future research than definitive readings. Moreover, the book could have used a more effective editor. The writing at times seems repetitive and the analysis is not as fully developed as it might have been. That said, this is a significant book based on impressive and pioneering archival research and will be required reading for anyone interested in late eighteenth-century and pre-famine Ireland. By showing the potent and complex ways that radical politics survived at a popular level throughout post-1798 Ireland, Patterson's study forces historians to reassess the roles played by sectarianism and agrarian protest in Ireland before the famine. These are important subjects and we have Patterson to thank for bringing them back to our attention.

SEAN FARRELL
Northern Illinois University

JOSEPH M. FEWSTER. The Keelmen of Tyneside: Labour Organisation and Conflict in the North-East Coal Industry, 1600–1830. (Regions and Regionalism in History, number 13.) Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell Press. 2011. Pp. x, 222. $99.00.

This book is a fine example of the good old labor history. It tells the story of the growth of labor institutions, of how wage-earning men used workplace organizing to battle exploitative, monopolistic employers encroaching on their livelihoods until the occupation they pursued was eliminated. In this respect it is quite good, the product of a lifetime's labor of love by a knowledgeable enthusiast. In others, however, it leaves a lot to be desired.

Joseph M. Fewster recounts the battle for control between the principal merchants of Newcastle upon Tyne and the men (and boys) who rowed small boats loaded with coal out to merchant ships waiting in the estuary. The keels were necessary because access to the coal loading zones was blocked by tides, an undredged river, and a low bridge. The merchants, many of them mine owners and magistrates, combined to form the Hostmen's Company, which controlled local politics and, by extension, the local economy. A significant proportion of hostmen became the "fitters" who negotiated with shipmasters and provided the keels. It was demanding labor requiring brute strength to row the tiny craft out and then to throw the coal, normally between twenty-one and twenty-two tons of it, into the holds of the larger colliers.

Keelmen, many of whom were Scottish migrants, signed annual bonds with the fitters. Petitions or other attempts to raise wages were met with the advice that keelmen should renegotiate at the "binding time." Fitters did not feel so bound and therefore lowered the wage rate or raised the minimum load to suit changing economic circumstances. The keelmen aired grievances ranging from payment in bad beer to the fitters' failure to abide by contractual agreements. Their limited weaponry included petitions, strikes, appeals for legislation, and, on a few occasions, destruction of offending coal-loading staithes. They did have advocates, most famously Daniel Defoe and most persistently the attorney Thomas Hardy, but the asymmetrical nature of the power relationship between keelmen and hostmen meant that the former enjoyed only occasional short-term victories.

Fewster supplies a detailed analysis, but while the title suggests a seventeenth-century component, the period between 1633 and 1699 is swept aside in a ten-page chapter. The narrative truly begins in 1699, when keelmen petitioned the hostmen for a means of support in cases of unemployment, sickness, and old age. The result was a charity, controlled by the hostmen and funded by keelmen, which built a hospital. Attempts at cooperation between the two groups foundered, and the subsequent century and a half saw conflict flaring between the impoverished keelmen and their wealthy employers. By the 1850s, however, the combination of railways, river improvements, and new harbors brought the curtain down on "the most turbulent section of the workforce on Tyneside" (p. 187).

Fewster's book illustrates the strengths and weaknesses of a focus on labor organizations. It shows how one local case study can highlight trends in the bigger picture, though the focus on conflict does lead to a somewhat fractured view as the narrative jumps from strike to strike. Admittedly not the type of continuous organizing the traditional historiography claims as constituting true trade unionism, nonetheless Fewster makes every effort to shoehorn the keelmen's attempts at organizing into a narrative arc from the "embryonic trade unionism" (p. 1) of the charity to a series of fighting, if fleeting, unions. A more productive approach would have been to see the charity as one element of the wider struggle to understand and solve the challenges facing keelmen, part of the multifaceted, phasic relationship between owners and wage earners.

Exhaustive research notwithstanding, many questions remain. How did the keelmen survive when the river was frozen or their occupation otherwise impossible to follow? What happened to the benefit society formed in 1788? Did it supplant the charity successfully, and what proportion of the keelmen became members? Were the Scottish keelmen migrants, or did they move permanently to Tyneside, and what did that mean for them and their families? How and why did the fitters create and enforce the bonded-labor system? As a detailed study of the keelmen and their organizations this is a nice book, but much is still to be written on the people who pursued the occupation, their families, their cultures, and their outlooks.

SIMON CORDERY
Monmouth College

WILLIAM M. MEIER. Property Crime in London, 1850–Present. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. 236. $85.00.

Crime in Britain, in England, and, indeed, in London fell significantly in the late nineteenth century but increased enormously in the twentieth century, transforming Britain into a high-crime society in which the very ubiquity of criminality is accepted. William M. Meier's book examines the reasons for this transformation through a meticulous examination of six different types of crime: burglary, shopbreaking, shoplifting, confidence schemes, robbery, and drug smuggling. Its central argument is that crime increased because of expanding technological opportunities and the democratization of criminal activity to the extent that both professional and amateur criminals were able to indulge themselves within an infrastructure of institutions—remand homes, borstals, and prisons of various types—which nurtured an incipient criminality more than it discouraged it. New forms of crime flourished, and “‘Cool Britannia’ has created crime in its own image” (p. 167).

One of my insightful lecturers of yesteryear, John Marshall, used to say that “crime statistics are a suspect category of a suspect breed.” Indeed, they do indicate the number of offenses recorded and changes in the law and undoubtedly reflect the numbers of police and their vigilance. Despite the present-day concerns of Howard Taylor that crime statistics are to some extent created to justify the role of the police and to serve their self-interest by providing a new and growing area of work, Meier suggests that crime statistics are real, with burglary rising despite the declining trends of the late nineteenth century, and drug smuggling growing from practically nil in the 1950s to epidemic proportions in the late twentieth century (p. 5). However, he also emphasizes that the concept of the existence of a “criminal class” did not long survive the nineteenth century faced with the ubiquity of crime in which professionals and amateurs flourished. He is most certainly right about the rising evidence of criminal statistics but surprisingly does not offer the weight of statistical evidence normally marshaled in a book of this type (except regarding the postwar spike in criminal statistics [p. 110] detailed in chapter five). Instead, Meier is much more interested in drawing colorful evidence from criminal cases. Evidently, burglary bucked the trend of decreasing crime during the late nineteenth century, with new technologies effectively countering doors, locks, and safes. This was demonstrated in the famous Cornhill Burglary of 1865, in which £6,000 of jewelry was robbed from a Milner “thief-proof” safe. The changing laws, including the Penal Servitude Act (1853), long sentences, and release on license, all served to change the nature of attitudes toward burglary. Many burglars felt that a constant life in prison did not prepare them for anything other than a return to burglary: “stone-breaking and oakum-picking, provided no practical training for finding work upon release” (p. 26). In the twentieth century, new technologies encouraged shopbreaking. The development of the motor car allowed the rise of the “motor bandit” and “smash and grab” raids on jewelers and other shops, which became the fashion in the late 1920s and all the rage in the mid-1930s. These events provoked the Metropolitan Police to introduce “Flying Squads,” fifty-two new motor cars equipped with wireless and manned by specially trained police officers. In Meier's treatment, working-class shoplifters, such as the “Forty Thieves” who preyed on West End draperies and department stores' specialized high-value furs, rub shoulders with the exclusively male confidence tricksters and conmen. There were cardsharps, or “broadsmen,” who lounged around first-class hotels waiting for “young men who had money to burn” (p. 101). In the internet age, this has evolved into email phishing scams.

There are problems in the balance of this book, as Meier relates broader criminal statistics to his specific examinations of criminal groups. Indeed, in some sections the author could—and should—have gone further. Some of his findings may stem more from police actions to deal with the worsening crime situation. Meier informs readers that he has omitted sex crimes, murder, violence, white-collar crimes, riots, and forms of deviance other than property crime, awaiting another volume, perhaps by the author himself (p. 7). Indeed, the prevalent crime of street betting and using betting houses is barely mentioned. Nevertheless, this book is undoubtedly a fine debut monograph.

KEITH LAYBOURN
University of Huddersfield

JOHN E. ARCHER. The Monster Evil: Policing and Violence in Victorian Liverpool. Liverpool: Liverpool University Press. 2011. Pp. xvii, 281. $34.95.

John E. Archer provides a fascinating and detailed analysis of violence in its myriad forms in Victorian Liverpool. As such, his book is part of a wider interest in violence and the “civilizing process” that has produced a flurry of recent studies of juvenile gangs in Birmingham, Manchester, and Liverpool as well as broader examinations of the “underworlds” of the two major northwestern English cities. Such detailed local studies are a welcome addition to the important, but more general, scholarship on nineteenth-century violence by Clive Emsley, Martin J. Wiener, and J. Carter Wood.

After a relatively brief introduction to the distinctive development of Liverpool, its reputation as “the most immoral of immoral places,” and the growth of the Liverpool borough police, Archer comes to his central concern: violent crime in the city, to which he devotes eight of the book’s thirteen chapters. Given the distinctiveness of Liverpool—notably its docks (with their reliance on casual labor) and its proximity to Ireland—it would have been most surprising, he argues, if Liverpool had not been a violent place. The various forms of violence—male-on-male, female, domestic, sectarian, gang—are considered in detail, but the analysis rests on a thorough and judicious examination of quantitative and qualitative evidence, which is presented in a highly readable manner. As one might expect from his earlier work, Archer is rightly skeptical of recorded crime statistics as an accurate measure of actual crime, and he is fully aware of the difficulties in making meaningful assessments of changes in the incidence of violence in the longer term. The cases that Archer quotes often make for very grim reading. Nonetheless, he concludes that Liverpool appeared to share in the “English miracle” of declining violence in the second half of the nineteenth century. However, early twentieth-century Liverpool was still a dangerous place, with high levels of female violence and the persistence of vicious gang conflicts arousing particular concern. Indeed, he argues that in some parts of the city there had been no significant change in the levels of violence. Archer is also concerned with responses to violence, and, particularly in the conclusion, he draws attention to the relative leniency showed to certain violent criminals, including child killers, as well as the absence of media panic about pedophilia.

There is much in this book that will be of interest to the lay reader wishing to know more about the violent past of Liverpool and to the academic (criminologist as much as historian) interested in the changing incidence of and attitudes toward violent crime in the nineteenth century. There are, however, a number of weaknesses in the book. Archer gives perhaps too much attention to Liverpool’s reputation as a site of violence, and it is not clear if local citizens (and even the author) found pride as well as shame in its notoriety. As a local study, it would have been interesting to see how Archer understood his work in relation to Michael Macilwee’s analysis of crime in Liverpool or Joseph O’Neill’s study of Manchester’s Victorian underworld. More generally, and even more importantly, further attention could have been paid to the wider context. Archer is too good a historian not to be aware of the literature on violence in Victorian Britain and not to be conscious of the difficulties of comparing one town or city with another. Nonetheless, it would have been valuable to see a more sustained comparison of, for example, Irish violence in its various forms in Liverpool, Middlesbrough, and Wolverhampton. Similarly, the discussion of court attitudes toward male violence in the later nineteenth century would have benefitted from a comparison with the work of Barry S. Godfrey et al. on gendered sentencing patterns.

Finally, there is a sense in which Archer is the victim of his ambition. The book’s subtitle refers to “policing” as well as “violence” in Victorian Liverpool. The latter is covered thoroughly and thoughtfully, the former less so. It would be unreasonable to expect a detailed analysis of the development of the local police, but more could have been said about changing police attitudes toward violence (at both upper and lower levels) and the way in which this impinged on the policing of violence in the city. The references to actual policing—or, more accurately, non-policing—of violence offer fascinating glimpses but require further detailed analysis and contextualization in the secondary literature. Despite these limitations, this is a well-researched and well-written book that will be of interest to a range of readers interested in the history of violence in one of England’s most notorious cities.

DAVID TAYLOR

University of Huddersfield

BRENT E. KINSER. The American Civil War in the Shaping of British Democracy. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate Publishing Company. 2011. Pp. 191. $99.95.

This study addresses one of the most mythologized of subjects: the influence of the American Civil War on British politics. It centers on four “literary politicians”: Thomas Carlyle, Anthony Trollope, Walter Bagehot, and John Stuart Mill. Brent E. Kinser’s readings are lively and make some bold claims, but are let down by a poor grasp of context and a surprising inattention to language.

For Kinser, British attitudes to America fell into two broad camps. For “liberals,” “America was the ‘hope’ of a bright and democratic future,” while “conservatives” saw in the United States the “dangers of . . . democracy” (p. 6) and longed for its “abject failure” (p. 69). Secession inspired “elation” in “conservative journals,” which hoped that it would “quiet the voices for democratic reform in Britain” (p. 2); but with victory for the Union, “the time had come for the expansion of suffrage in Britain.” With the passing of the Second Reform Act in 1867, “the [British] working classes were now also to be ‘free’” (p. 48).

There is much myth and misconception here. The fiercest critics of democracy were men who saw themselves as liberals. They aspired to a form of government that was sensitive to public opinion, free from class interests, and respectful of personal freedom, and it was by this standard that democracy was found wanting. Nor was “conservative” opinion as hostile as Kinser believes. Disraeli thought democracy “eminently suited” to America, while The Times hailed the United States as Britain’s “proudest historical monument.” That secession “should be the end of the great American Republic” was “a prospect against which every friend of humanity and progress would gladly close his eyes” (quoted in Robert Saunders, Democracy and the Vote in British Politics, 1864–1867: The Making of the Second Reform Act [2011], pp. 143, 153).

If the Civil War was held to have exposed the weaknesses of democracy, it does not follow that the Union victory showed democracy triumphant. The United States in 1865 had just emerged from four years of fratricidal bloodshed in which perhaps 600,000 Americans had died. As The Times asked its readers, was “not the fact that war was necessary . . . some slur on the representative system of the States?” (The Times, 6 April 1866, p. 8). With half the states under military rule, a president being impeached, and new conflicts brewing over Reconstruction, American democracy was hardly an object for emulation.

The idea that the Second Reform Act was a response to the North’s victory holds little water. Reform had its own, indigenous history in Britain, but Kinser’s grasp of the subject is unconvincing. The Third Reform Act is credited on one page with “the adoption of universal manhood suffrage” and on another with allowing “one in three British males to vote” (pp. 126, 163); neither is correct. A third attempt, dating universal male suffrage to 1914, is also wrong (p. 163). The 1859 reform bill did not “eliminate rural freeholders from the electorate” (p. 94), and Thomas Hare designed a system of proportional representation, not “plural voting” (pp. 94, 108). Above all, Kinser persistently conflates “democracy” with “representative government.” If “Disraeli had accomplished . . . the democratic reform of Parliament” (p. 124), it is curious that he should have told MPs that “We do not . . . live—and I trust it will never be the fate of this country to live—under a democracy” (18 March 1867, quoted in Parliamentary Debates, series 3, volume 186, column 7).

Such misconceptions reflect Kinser’s antiquated historiography. E. D. Adams, whose magnum opus appeared in 1925, looms worryingly large, while more recent scholarship, like the work of Duncan A. Campbell, is absent. Inevitably, this weakens Kinser’s capacity to put his authors in context. For example, Mill’s support for black enfranchisement in America did not “contradict” his “ambivalent attitude” toward an uneducated electorate at home (p. 133). For Mill, the issue was not whether the poor and ignorant should be barred from voting, but whether a distinction should be drawn within those classes on the basis of race. By contrasting their statements on “public opinion,” Kinser concludes that Bagehot “was clearly less anxious about it” than Mill (pp. 95, 107). Yet the two men used these terms in very different ways. Mill, in the passage quoted, refers to “collective mediocrity,” while Bagehot used it to mean an elite opinion to which the working classes “contribute almost nothing” (Walter Bagehot, The English Constitution, ed. P. Smith [2001], p. 116). Their arguments were not so much in opposition as directed toward different phenomena.

Kinser makes bold claims for his authors: “no other figure . . . did more for the cause of democracy than Carlyle” (p. 14); Trollope “unmistakeably implies that [democracy] . . . must be accomplished in Britain” (p.

65); Carlyle, Trollope, and Bagehot all believed that “slaves must be included in the democratic fabric of the nation” (p. 102). Unfortunately, Kinser never explains what his authors understood by democracy. He takes for granted that, when Trollope praises “what America has done,” the author “of course . . . alludes to democracy.” He is then puzzled to find Trollope writing “I dislike universal suffrage” and “the tyranny of democracy,” a position he finds “conflicted” (p. 60). Bagehot, likewise, “has plenty to say in opposition to democracy,” but “his vision of the essential role played by public opinion . . . certainly seems democratic” (p. 117). Some of these paradoxes would have resolved themselves had Kinser thought more carefully about his terms.

The publishers are also at fault. The copyediting is slipshod, the bottom third of page 51 is chopped off, and the first chapter ends mid-sentence. For this, Kinser deserves an apology.

ROBERT SAUNDERS
St John’s College,
University of Oxford

SAM JOHNSON. Pogroms, Peasants, Jews: Britain and Eastern Europe’s “Jewish Question,” 1867–1925. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. xi, 296. $90.00.

The reception and settlement of Jews in the United Kingdom during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries have been the subjects of considerable scholarly attention. As a nation wedded to free trade, the British were loath to restrict immigration of any kind, but Jews—or rather poor, Yiddish-speaking Jews from Russia, Poland, and Romania—were generally unwelcome, and the Anglo-Jewish leadership therefore did its best both to dissuade these migrants from landing at British ports and to send them on, as speedily as possible, to any other country that would have them (principally the United States). When, at last, an Aliens Act (1905) was passed by a Conservative government anxious to prove its populist credentials, the legislation (welcomed by the trade union movement) went unopposed by the London Committee of Deputies of British Jews.

This story is well known. What until now has been less understood is the manner in which East European Jews were depicted by the British media and by what one might term the intellectual opinion-forming classes. When news of anti-Jewish pogroms in Eastern Europe reached Britain there were, to be sure, lofty expressions of horror and disgust from the good and the great: letters to the press, donations of money to relieve the victims of these persecutions, even well-choreographed public meetings. Are scholars, therefore, to infer that these expressions of compassion tell us all we wish to know about how the British viewed the plight of Jews in Eastern Europe?

In her ground-breaking and admirably researched study of Britain and Eastern Europe’s “Jewish Question,” Sam Johnson supplies the depressing answer. Violent attacks upon Jews were rarely condoned, but they were habitually contextualized (as it were) within a wider and heavily racialized view of Jews and the Jewish world. Whether in the pages of newspapers or in the writings of the intelligentsia, no effort was spared to paint Jews in the darkest possible hues, as almost deserving of the disabilities from which they suffered.

Take the case of Romania, whose freedom from Ottoman oppression became an obsession in Britain during the 1860s and 1870s. Romanian nationalists were fiercely opposed to granting citizenship to Romania's Jewish inhabitants. Successive Romanian administrations comprehensively ignored the safeguards for Jews inserted (at the insistence of Benjamin Disraeli, Britain's Jewish prime minister) in the Berlin treaty of 1878. But the persistence of such discrimination was widely applauded in the British media. Without it, The Scotsman argued in 1877, the entirety of Romania would be "in the hands of the Jews." "The Jews are too clever for the [Romanian] Christians," the Saturday Review had argued the previous year. "They make money when the degraded Christians do not."

So Christians needed to be protected from Jews. And while violent attacks upon Jews needed to be condemned—and were—they also needed to be understood. It is true that the Russian pogroms that followed the 1881 assassination of Tsar Alexander II attracted widespread denunciation in the British press, but they did so partly because they were deemed—incorrectly and against all the verifiable evidence—to have been officially inspired, sanctioned, and organized. Quite simply, it suited the British mindset to be reassured that tsarist Russia was indeed a savage and barbaric place. There was sympathy for the Jews but also apprehension lest the pogroms force yet more of them to seek sanctuary in a British port. The economic boycott of Jews in Poland, sponsored in and from 1912 by the National Democratic party led by Roman Dmowski (an architect of Polish independence but also an unashamed anti-semiter), attracted remarkably little criticism in Great Britain. Indeed, the British establishment feted Dmowski and the doors of Whitehall were opened to him. In the opinion of the journalist and author Beatrice Baskerville (a self-taught Polish speaker), there were just too many Jews in Poland and they wielded too much economic power.

In the final chapter of her monograph Johnson distills all this evidence into a most perceptive scrutiny of the manner in which "the Jew" was imagined in Great Britain a hundred or so years ago. As she demonstrates, it was an imagining deeply affected by the crudest, racialized discourse. In the popular mind, the East European Jew was a religious outcast and an economic parasite. Johnson ends her investigation in the mid-1920s with the passage of draconian anti-Jewish measures enacted by the postwar governments of an independent Poland. The undoubted popularity of these laws does much to explain Polish collaboration in the Nazi extermination of Jews. But it also helps us understand why the appeasement of Nazi Germany attracted so much support from virtually all sections of British society during the following decade.

GEOFFREY ALDERMAN
University of Buckingham

SAMUEL J. M. M. ALBERTI. Morbid Curiosities: Medical Museums in Nineteenth-Century Britain. New York: Oxford University Press, 2011. Pp. xiii, 238. $99.00.

The museums referred to in this book's subtitle are those dedicated to anatomy and pathology, institutions that in present-day Britain have become endangered species, since the license required to display human organs can be difficult to obtain and the educational value of "wet" specimens to students and to the public has been called into question. The reputation of anatomy museums has also suffered from a tendency for commentators to focus on displays of human body parts as examples of a culture of medical paternalism or as sensationalist freak shows. The contrast between the importance placed on museums by nineteenth-century medical practitioners—some of whom spent lifetimes and fortunes collecting and preserving human material—and the limited attention given to them by historians of medicine is, as Samuel J. M. M. Alberti observes, remarkable, and the deficiency has only recently begun to be addressed. One difficulty is that to engage fully with their history, we must be prepared to view anatomical pathology collections from both cultural and medical perspectives: we must get over the shock of finding human body parts on display and ask how they came to be there and what purpose they served.

This is exactly how Alberti, who as director of museums at the Royal College of Surgeons in London is well qualified for his task, approaches the subject, considering the provenance of each individual specimen on the museum shelf. Fragmentation of the body, with all of its inherent problems, is a central theme, and Alberti emphasizes that a museum pot is not simply an object to be described (as if by a student in an examination) but a carefully crafted work that holds different meanings for the many observers who will encounter it during its career. The pot's meaning changes as it is rearranged, recategorized, and re-presented to meet the needs of the museum's clientele.

Professional and popular collections are considered together, an insightful approach that makes the shilling anatomy museums, so disparaged in some quarters, appear not so different from their grander institutional cousins. The craft of specimen preparation, a hitherto neglected topic, is treated in necessary detail. Only by understanding the techniques involved in creating a museum pot can we appreciate its dual status as a created artifact and a relic of bodily pathology. Throughout the book, Alberti reminds readers that it is possible to see each specimen as, among other things, a body part, a monstrosity, a typical example of disease, or a work of art. Each reading depends upon location (pregnant uteri were consigned to the pathology shelves), presentation, and history, as well as our own expectations. The point is well made that visitors to a museum did not always read its contents in an approved way; proprietors of anatomy museums usually insisted that their collections were educational, but visitor responses can be harder to pin down.

Alberti briefly describes the use of waxworks and other models—they were less important in Britain than in continental Europe—but the main emphasis is on human tissues. Developments within pathology are clearly key to understanding the vogue for medical museums, and the book benefits from an outline of contemporaneous trends in pathological science, though it would have been interesting to hear the author's views on why pathology developed as a separate discipline in the late nineteenth century, a development in which the medical museum was pivotal. The contribution of medical men to museums receives a refreshingly balanced treatment. The image of two medical knights, Charles Bell and Astley Cooper, potting up specimens before starting their day's work vividly recalls the hours of unpleasant toil that the making of a pathology museum entailed.

The nineteenth century was the heyday of medical museums, but no study would be complete without an account of their decline. A concluding chapter carries the story up to the organ retention scandals that led to the Human Tissue Act (2004). Many collections disappeared with the introduction of this new regulatory system, and as the section title "evolution or extinction?" suggests, those remaining faced hard times, because they needed a "high footfall" to prevent "encroachment" on their funding. The Royal College of Surgeons Museum has successfully adapted, but not all can follow the route of public engagement; some must still cater to the anatomical pathologists by whom and for whom they were assembled. Nineteenth-century claims, in the wake of the Anatomy Act (1832), that it was not possible to teach anatomy without a museum remind scholars of the special value of archived tissues at times when fresh material is difficult to obtain. Alberti succeeds in reaffirming the scientific, historical, and cultural importance of medical museums and provides an excellent introduction to this fascinating subject.

A. W. BATES

University College London

THEODORE KODITSCHKEK. Liberalism, Imperialism, and the Historical Imagination: Nineteenth-Century Visions of a Greater Britain. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 351. $99.00.

This incisive study combines vivid biographical sketches with acute readings of texts to offer a nuanced and revealing portrait of liberalism's troubled marriage to the nineteenth-century British Empire. Theodore Koditschek has self-consciously, and effectively, chosen to occupy a space between high theory and microhistory; his focus on authors who, though mostly not great thinkers, were at once committed historians and figures in imperial administration proves consistently fruitful.

Although his attention to writers of history means that Koditschek has little to say about certain key theorists of liberalism and empire in the nineteenth century, such as John Stuart Mill or Richard Cobden, it is remarkable how many of the most significant ideologues and agents of liberal empire are captured by his rubric. The narrative is deftly woven to take up recurrent themes—imperial romance, "bordering," nostalgia—in unexpected and convincing ways. He includes several novelists—Maria Edgeworth, Sydney Owenson (Lady Morgan), Walter Scott—who, though not strictly historians, conceived of Britain's imperial mission in historical terms and, in Scott's case, greatly influenced the British "historical imagination" across the century and the empire.

Koditschek situates each of his authors biographically relative to the British Empire, noting that many saw themselves as outsiders to a core English society. His approach reveals the transimperial perspectives that often shaped the expanding empire. Anglo-Irish Protestant landlords and Scottish lowlanders carried their native preoccupations to their posts in India; the Bombay merchant and mathematics professor Dadabhai Naoroji used political economy to catalogue imperial exploitation and puncture the liberal myth of imperial benevolence, and once in London drew from the Irish example the lesson that Indians must gain seats in parliament if they hoped to get on the political agenda. The book manages to cover a broad range of figures, each with a satisfying degree of depth, thus providing a more textured account of liberal imperialism than is possible in studies of canonical political thinkers such as Uday Singh Mehta's Liberalism and Empire: A Study in Nineteenth-Century British Liberal Thought (1999) or this reviewer's A Turn to Empire: The Rise of Imperial Liberalism in Britain and France (2005).

Scott and Thomas Babington Macaulay prove central figures. Scott perfected a formula of imperial romance that attracted a variety of thinkers but that no others were able to use to such effect. The basic success of the incorporation of Scotland within Great Britain by the early nineteenth century meant that Scott could romanticize those who had resisted conquest without threatening or indeed even questioning the imperial settlement. Scott's imperial epics "provide a dress rehearsal for liberal Empire" (p. 33), with inhabitants of the conquered peripheries accepting the necessity of submission, while citizens of the triumphant metropole admire their no longer menacing courage and virtue and learn to accord them dignity, and some cultural autonomy, in the new union.

No such imperial romance was possible in Ireland, where Maria Edgeworth's own earlier attempts at "fables of union" (p. 28) had stumbled on the intransigence of the Anglo-Irish ruling caste and the hostility of the oppressed Catholic majority. In India, Scott's admirers among his many countrymen in colonial service, such as John Malcolm and James Tod, were similarly unable to pull off their efforts to co-opt Indian nobles into an asymmetrical union. The Bengali liberal Ram-mohun Roy's more imaginative efforts toward imperial unity—what Koditschek calls his “global, even cosmic, bordering” (p. 94)—had him professing pride in being a subject of the empire even as he challenged the British to fulfill their hitherto empty promises of liberty for the colonized.

Scott's romance of union, so clearly faltering in the overseas empire, was displaced by Macaulay's “English middle-class romance” (p. 12), which yoked the progress narrative to an avowedly anglocentric universalism that invited the conquered to admire and aspire to English constitutionalism while it relegated them to the status of cultural and political children. But Macaulay's narrative was, if anything, less adequate than Scott's to the challenges of a global empire; readers in India and Ireland recognized this, even as Bengali bhadralok liberals such as Bankimchandra Chattopadhyay, R. C. Dutt, and Surendranath Banerjea attempted in various ways to radicalize Macaulayism while refusing its parochialism.

Macaulay's more complacent English public quickly retreated from his program of legal reform, extension of civil status, and the creation of a “collaborative bourgeoisie” (p. 226) in the colonies. As it became clear that the supposedly temporary despotism envisioned by James Mill and Macaulay was not laying the ground for political equality or self-government in the empire, English historians abandoned the liberal progress narrative in favor of more avowedly authoritarian imperial schemas and schemes. J. A. Froude, the most reactionary figure in the book, reconceived Greater Britain not as a beacon of liberty but as a bulwark of security, a “necessary perimeter” (p. 204) in uncertain times. Others turned to far longer time-frames of evolutionary history (Charles Dilke and Henry Maine) or to racial theories (Sir George Campbell and E. A. Freeman) to justify a “differential liberal vision” (p. 226) of political freedom at home—and increasingly for white settler populations—and despotism for non-white imperial subjects. The conversation became utterly one sided, with Indian liberals continuing, as Rammohun Roy had done, to take liberalism seriously even as they recognized its failures, while English liberals turned on the class they had created, charging them with inauthenticity and spinelessness. Imperial historians such as John Robert Seeley had little inkling of their colonial readership; they “did not so much silence the voice of colonial others as deafen British ears to the amplifying colonial sounds” (p. 341). Koditschek's rich account shows powerfully how contradictions internal to liberalism so readily issued in the racism or narrow culturalism of the post-1857 generation in England and in the thorough disillusionment of the colonial liberals whom it had shaped and then refused.

JENNIFER PITTS
University of Chicago

Historical Monographs.) New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 304. $110.00.

Several recent studies have traced the ebb and flow of John Ruskin's reputation as a social and political thinker in his own day and in the twentieth century. Stuart Eagles builds on previous work to argue that Ruskin's influence was most significant in its impact on public-spirited activists, both men and women, who engaged in broadly progressive civic and social reform from the last decades of the Victorian period up to World War I. Urging his followers to reject the ugliness of modern industrial capitalism, Ruskin offered instead a vision that celebrated the connectedness of art, nature, and human labor and that sought the dignity and well-being of laborers as the highest social goal. His slashing critiques of laissez-faire liberalism, especially “Unto This Last”: Four Essays on the First Principles of Political Economy (1862), enraged an audience that had come to regard competition in the free market as the key to British greatness. After 1870, however, Ruskin's social criticism found receptive readers as activists and thinkers at home and beyond—William Morris, Octavia Hill, J. A. Hobson, James Keir Hardie, Leo Tolstoy, Mohandas K. Gandhi, and Jane Addams, among others—proudly acknowledged his influence. Today he is cited as a prophet of ethical consumerism, environmentalism, and the sustainability movement.

The special strength of this study lies in its comprehensive and detailed portrayal of the “places and networks” (p. 3) where Ruskin's disciples met, conversed, and laid their plans for reformist projects dedicated to carrying out his holistic creed. From model farms to handicraft cooperatives, libraries, museums, and parks; from the National Trust to the University Extension movement and the nascent Labour Party, the practical results of Ruskin's ideas ramified through many areas of British life. Organizations that promoted Ruskinian reforms included the Guild of St. George, Toynbee Hall, the Charity Organisation Society, and the many Ruskin societies that sprang up in the 1870s and 1880s. Eagles's discussion of Ruskin's notorious project to recruit Oxford undergraduates to build a new road for the nearby village of Hinksey in 1874 is particularly informative. Though much mocked both at the time and later, this scheme was more than a quixotic attempt to teach privileged young men about the dignity of labor through digging and rock breaking. It was motivated partly by public health concerns (the need for a well-drained road had become apparent following a cholera outbreak), and a number of those who participated went on to become leaders at Toynbee Hall (Arnold Toynbee was an enthusiastic digger) and university settlements in Manchester and Glasgow.

Eagles identifies and delineates, though he does not fully analyze, a series of paradoxes that marked the relationship between the prophet and his disciples. Ruskin frequently dismissed the efficacy of his own writings—“The more I see of writing, the less I care for it,” he claimed (p. 60)—and it was a potent element in his appeal that he called on his followers to undertake active reform efforts. Yet his distaste and lack of capacity for organizational work was partly responsible for the failure of some of the schemes inspired by his ideas. Eagles points out that “the Master” himself was at best ambivalent about some of the most successful projects carried out under his influence, for example, the university settlements. While Ruskin expressed pessimism about any effort to redeem modern urban society, urging his followers to save what could yet be saved of traditional rural life, disciples were driven to reformist ameliorative projects in those places where the ugliness and degradation produced by industrial capitalism were most apparent, in the slums of London, Manchester, Birmingham, and Glasgow. Similarly, while Ruskin described himself as a “violent Tory,” preached the virtues of hierarchy, and derided democracy, his works were hailed as transformative by the autodidact leaders of the nascent Labour Party, who welcomed the “freshness and vitality” (p. 207) of Ruskin’s “uniquely aestheticized” (p. 206) economic vision while cheerfully disregarding his scathing denunciations of parliamentary politics.

STUART EAGLES. After Ruskin: The Social and Political Legacies of a Victorian Prophet, 1870–1920. (Oxford

Eagles has produced a meticulously researched history of Ruskin’s audiences and the institutions through which they sought to put his ideas into practice. His chapter on the Ruskin societies, for example, provides a rich account, based on surveys of surviving lecture announcements, local newspaper accounts, and society minute books and library records, of the larger cultural fabric underpinning much Ruskin worship. These organizations emerged at a time when literary societies had become fashionable, and there were groups dedicated to William Shakespeare, Geoffrey Chaucer, Charles Dickens, William Wordsworth, and other literary greats. Yet the Ruskin societies were not mere conversation clubs: members acted as pressure groups, calling for reform and social welfare legislation in their localities. There are times when the abundance of detail in the book, especially the long lists of names and accompanying dates, may overwhelm the reader, and the focus on institutional membership can lead to some odd omissions. Surely one of Ruskin’s most effective disciples was the Liberal MP Sir John Lubbock, author of the Bank Holiday Act and the Ancient Monuments Protection Act, yet he appears nowhere in the text. Those criticisms aside, readers will find that this book presents an absorbing, persuasive, and well-substantiated case for Ruskin’s significance for modern British culture.

MARJORIE WHEELER-BARCLAY
Randolph College

LAURA TABILI. Global Migrants, Local Culture: Natives and Newcomers in Provincial England, 1841–1939. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. x, 329. $85.00.

This impressive book argues against the common popular and historical perception of traditional Britain as a homogeneous and closed society. In it, Laura Tabili contends that previous historians have been predisposed to find that immigrants, whether from Europe or the colonies, were excluded from communities because their studies focused on visible clusters of outsiders and flashpoints of conflict. In contrast, Tabili conducted a full survey of census enumerators’ books for South Shields (on the Tyne River, near Newcastle), compiling a complete list of all people born outside of England censused in the years under study. What she found in the census, through naturalization records, and in other contemporary accounts supports her contention that prior to the early twentieth century immigrants were well integrated and accepted within this English community. She argues that it was only the approach of Europe-wide conflict and discriminatory policies at the national level that led to the suspicion and exclusion of immigrants in the town. Although her focus is on the largely maritime community of South Shields, Tabili presents a convincing case that her findings are valid for a much wider swath of the nation.

In supporting her primary argument Tabili makes significant contributions to the historiography of migration in Britain. She completes the first detailed analysis of a German immigrant community in Britain, discovering that the majority of German-born individuals in South Shields were not members of the German Mission, which was the community’s most prominent feature. While the mission served large numbers of German mariners, it was supported by less than a third of the whole German population in 1901. This finding reflects Tabili’s data regarding immigrants of other nationalities, as well. Until just prior to World War I, even the Arab immigrants in South Shields, like those from other European nations, were dispersed throughout the town and prone to choosing native British marriage partners. The method of identifying all immigrants in the census also led Tabili to an important finding regarding Britons’ own migration patterns. Most immigrants in South Shields, she found, lived in households made up primarily of native-born Britons, and many of these were the children of British natives. Using children’s birthplaces, she traced individuals’ movements over a significant period of their lives and came to the conclusion that Britain in the nineteenth century was far more cosmopolitan than insular. Those who did not themselves migrate were living cheek-by-jowl with people who did. This, Tabili argues, “undermines views of . . . plebian and working-class Britons as isolated, unsophisticated and innocent of the world and its inhabitants” (p. 110). When she does discover exclusion and persecution of immigrants emerging in South Shields, she explains it in a rational context of global and regional politics rather than an ahistorical British xenophobia. In a global context, the migrants did not behave in surprising ways; the patterns revealed are similar to those in the rest of Europe in the same period. What is surprising is that they were in South Shields at all and that the evidence tells a story so different from the popularly understood narrative of British social history.

Tabili’s method means that at times (particularly in the earlier period of her study) she was working with a microscopically small number of individuals. Her entire subject group only surpassed one percent of the town's population in 1891. At times in the text, it seems as if she names each immigrant individually, but it is hard to escape the feeling that this is an extraordinarily small number of people on which to base her conclusions. Her practice of including all people born abroad—even those with two British parents—in her sample raises questions about just how “alien” some of the immigrants would have appeared. After the midpoint of the book, however, closer examination of communities and legislation allow a convincing argument in spite of these misgivings regarding the sample.

Overall, this book is a very good example of modern social history. It is well, if sometimes densely, written, with many pleasing turns of phrase. Gender is integrated into the analysis not as a feminist exercise but as an important element of a story that is not complete without it. While demographic statistics are at its heart, it includes ample qualitative evidence to give flesh and life to those bones. It is a local study that never forgets that South Shields existed in a larger world, skillfully connecting global and local phenomena. Britons, Tabili argues, have a long history of accepting and incorporating outsiders in their midst, which she poses as an instructive lesson for modern British society as well as an admonition for historians to examine entire communities rather than fixating on highly visible, but singular, events.

WENDY M. GORDON
State University of New York,
Plattsburgh

DAMON IEREMIA SALESA. Racial Crossings: Race, Intermarriage, and the Victorian British Empire. (Oxford Historical Monographs.) New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. x, 295. $110.00.

Edward Gibbon Wakefield's advocacy of systematic colonization found many believers in Victorian Britain. Damon Ieremia Salea's thought-provoking study discusses how and why various reiterations became entangled with colonial policies of racial amalgamation. His particular focus is the significant role played by racial intermarriage and mixed-race offspring in the incorporation of New Zealand and its peoples into the British Empire.

Salea makes a compelling case for the broader imperial and transnational resonances of the local and regional as he explores the racial crossings that punctuated New Zealand's encounters with Victorian science and enterprise. At the same time, he challenges the “racial exceptionalism” thesis that describes New Zealand as a historical model for harmonious race relations. He shows the vitally constitutive role played by discourses, dissonances, conflicts, and practices surrounding race that moved across and within the “webs of empire.” When analyzing the frequently anachronistic usage of labels such as “Maori” and “Native,” Salea makes a compelling case for the choice of Tangata Whenoa (person of the land) to refer to New Zealand's indigenous peoples. Contested nomenclatures and categories—whether Tangata Whenoa, Pakeha, half-caste, or European—prove crucial to the author's careful interweaving of indigenous, regional, and imperial narratives and the multiple identities that come under his lens.

The book frames the policies of racial amalgamation around the larger contexts of “imperial networks” and the “encounters in place” that occurred around race, political reform, and colonization. Early New Zealand boosters such as Patrick Matthew adopted the scientific language of “botanical grafting” of races to describe the best means for colonizers to adapt. Colonization projects launched by the Scots Company and the New Zealand Company from the 1830s developed this theme into plans for “racial amalgamation” that involved adjacent living spaces for white and indigenous races based on land acquisitions by the former from the latter, cemented by interracial “social alliances” undertaken along recognized axes of class and gender.

At the metropole, however, the rise of polygenism was creating new anxieties around the “tender ties” of racial crossings. If human beings belonged to different species, then mixing different races surely was analogous to crossbreeding species. Alarmed at the possibility of sterile offspring, the Anthropological Society of London vociferously attacked racial hybrids. Their opponents, including the Ethnological Society of London and the Aborigines' Protection Society, continued to argue that different human races could breed successfully since they had done so throughout history. The anthropologists were articulating in scientific idiom the same misgivings about undue proximity of indigenous groups and white settlers that Welsh and Anglican missionaries had already voiced about the racial “pandemonium” of early nineteenth-century New Zealand.

That supposed lack of order gave the impetus for mid-century templates of organized colonization, which developed and imposed racial taxonomies for settlers, indigenes, and in-between groups. In addition, the Colonial Office's concern about imminent extinction of aboriginal groups across the empire led it to support a project of racial amalgamation as its only solution. This project was largely inspired by the ideas of Herman Merivale, political economist turned mandarin, who advocated “the union of natives with settlers in the same community, as master and servant, as fellow-labourers, as fellow-citizens, and if possible, as connected by intermarriage . . . the only possible Euthanasia of savage communities” (p. 95). As suggested by Merivale's use of the term euthanasia, the seemingly humanitarian impulses underlying this project are, on closer scrutiny, deeply troubling.

While the stated aim of New Zealand's British officials was to ameliorate racial tensions via the amalgamation mission, in reality their concomitant intensification of colonization served to sharpen race disparities and heighten hierarchies, particularly around gender. Governor George Grey, for instance, claimed to be replacing the disorder of illicit unions with interventionist policies that aimed at regulating the land holdings, civil marriages, and medical facilities afforded to those British subjects engaged in racial crossings and their mixed-race offspring. A number of legal suits ensued in which the rights of mixed-race children to hold lands through their indigenous mothers were jeopardized by the patriarchal inheritance code that colonialism introduced following the English model.

The book ends with an exploration of the wars of the 1860s as an opportunity for the state to reconfigure and extend policies and institutions that restructured intimate spaces and indigenous sociabilities. Yet, as Salesa's final pages show, it is important not to overestimate the reach of such instruments or to underestimate the capabilities of indigenous and mixed-race families, especially their women members, to resist and redirect colonial pressures that sought to transform their lives and identities. The book concludes with a brief exposition of the life of "half-caste" Maria Aminta Maning; though reared as a colonial lady, Maning's adult life and creativity revolved around her growing self-awareness as "mixed in mind." Salesa thus provides readers with a vivid reminder of the limitations of colonial hegemony and, indeed, of the conventional colonial archive.

JAYEETA SHARMA
University of Toronto

SANDRA TRUDGEN DAWSON. Holiday Camps in Twentieth-Century Britain: Packaging Pleasure. (Studies in Popular Culture.) New York: Manchester University Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 246. $89.95.

For me, British holiday camps inevitably evoke the jaunty opening of "Tommy's Holiday Camp," a track on the The Who's 1969 rock opera album Tommy. Kicked off by a cheery (albeit sarcastic) "Good morning campers!," a greeting that would have been quite familiar to the band's British audience, the song mockingly holds out the promise of a never-ending holiday at Tommy's special camp, one ostensibly dedicated to training in pinball wizardry but ultimately aimed at inculcating mind- and soul-numbing conformity. Yet as Sandra Trudgen Dawson's history of these camps points out, to a number of people in twentieth-century Britain, holiday camps represented more than simply homogenized, repetitive, and excessively organized leisure. For the British government, the labor movement and Labour party, and the many campers who made repeated summer trips to them, holiday camps represented the promise of twentieth-century "progress" in a number of ways. By spending time at a Butlin's or Warner's camp, working-class Britons could begin to enjoy the leisure and relaxation previously only available to their middle-class and aristocratic fellow citizens; they thus would share in the full benefits of twentieth-century British citizenship.

Dawson traces the development of the camps from the interwar decades, a period in which the British government began to consider holidays as a significant component of workers' health and as a means of countering modernity's less salutary effects. In particular, she points to the passage of the 1938 Holidays with Pay Act as a turning point that provided the foundation for holiday camps' expansion. Leisure entrepreneurs such as Billy Butlin and Harry Warner were only too willing to build on that foundation, and, as Dawson demonstrates, they took full advantage of genres of mass culture (newspapers, magazines) to run advertising campaigns promoting the camps' atmosphere and activities. Dawson's discussion of these campaigns is particularly interesting, as she explores the camp owners' use of both reporters' and celebrities' descriptions of the holiday camp experience (many of the latter were or had been employees of the camps). Their endorsements, which continued well into the post-World War II period, suggested that the camps were places where working-class people could afford to enjoy luxuries unavailable to them at home and, of equal importance, would do so in a friendly, unpretentious, and democratic atmosphere in which they need not fear being patronized or intimidated. Judging by the high numbers of those who came back to the holiday camps, visitors agreed.

As Dawson points out, while we might expect the camps to have suffered during World War II, matters were more complicated. To be sure, camps were commandeered for troops, a form of state intervention that temporarily halted the typical camping holiday. However, they also were seen as a way of housing civilians—particularly women—working in war industries. Warner and Butlin thus were able to expand the number of camp sites, which in turn allowed them to grow their businesses substantially during the postwar years. Moreover, Dawson demonstrates the continuing link between the state's promotion of particular kinds of leisure and the holiday camps, since the former's promotion of cultural "uplift" (radio comedy, Shakespeare, ballet, and opera) was picked up by the camps' owners and incorporated into postwar entertainments. Her discussion of the 1950s and 1960s is a very rich one. Dawson reveals the ways in which the camps became increasingly lucrative and a significant sector of the British entertainment and leisure industry but also had to contend with labor shortages (in part, by hiring workers from former British colonies) and competition from the other holiday options chosen by British families (taking holidays abroad, staying at home, or pitching tents in temporary sites). Despite these challenges, the camps continued to play an important part in British cultural life, especially since their owners hired popular entertainers—Cliff Richard, Ringo Starr, Des O'Connor, to name a few—and images of the camps circulated in children's literature, novels, films, and song lyrics.

This very rich and well-researched study adds considerable depth to our understanding of twentieth-century British popular culture and leisure. In addition, Dawson suggests the important role of gender relations in helping to solidify the camps' appeal. By providing for all members of the working-class family, from meals to child care and after-dinner entertainment, Butlin and Warner offered important alternatives to working-class wives and mothers, groups which the interwar state believed were sorely in need of relaxation. Pace Pete Townshend, while Dawson is fully cognizant of the repetitive and standardized nature of the camps' physical sites and routines, her oral histories provide persuasive evidence that holiday camps "packaged pleasure" in ways that appealed to the desires of many working-class British men, women, and children.

CECILIA MORGAN
University of Toronto

FERGAL MCCLUSKEY. Fenians and Ribbonmen: The Development of Republican Politics in East Tyrone, 1898–1918. New York: Manchester University Press. 2011. Pp. ix, 282. $95.00.

The demand for Irish self-government was represented at Westminster by a cohort of Home Rule/Irish Parliamentary Party MPs from 1874 until 1918, when they were largely swept aside by a Sinn Féin Party riding the tide of postwar plebiscitary national self-determination. The Irish Parliamentary Party's command of its constituencies was not based on a single dedicated organization but depended instead on a series of grassroots movements that were in fairly constant flux, might be at odds with one another, needed to be watched vigilantly, and frequently had to be manipulated for the greater good of the elite. This associational milieu became more crowded and more challenging in the last years of the nineteenth century, a development that justifies the chronological scope of Fergal McCluskey's book. The Fenians and Ribbonmen of the title refer to two modes of activism, corresponding more or less with two nationalist organizations of great interest to the parliamentarians and well entrenched at home and among the Irish abroad. Since the Fenians are identified with republican affairs, the book's focus is signaled by the reference to "republican politics" in the subtitle. The eastern part of County Tyrone, stretching outward from the western shore of Lough Neagh, was a well-known locus of republican activity throughout much of the twentieth century.

McCluskey focuses on republican politics primarily as the expression of a popular ideology. The thoughts of Antonio Gramsci and George Rudé on ideology are deployed interestingly at the beginning and conclusion of the book with a view to analyzing developments in Ireland. However, it is not easy to write a history book about abstract ideology, and the main body of this work consists of an account of the discourses and strategies of nationalist groupings over two turbulent decades. McCluskey's principal task is to explain how a republican minority group succeeded, after several false starts and setbacks, through its influence over Sinn Féin, in placing itself in the driver's seat at the general election of 1918. This is carried through coherently and dispassionately, but more in the style of an extended essay pursuing a theme than of a monograph methodically exploring the contours of a political world. The argument of the book refers to a considerable extent to the wider national scene rather than just Tyrone and to that extent is based on deployment of familiar secondary information. In keeping with the essay-style treatment, the reader is presumed to be fully acquainted with every twist and turn of the national politics of the period. Those not so prepared will find themselves lost at many points for the sake of the relatively small effort that would have been required to provide them with the necessary signposts.

That the author has conducted very substantial research is evidenced by plentiful information about the place of Tyrone, and northern Fenians, in the national story. Police records, newspaper files, and private papers have been diligently worked to this end. However, this information is dispensed, as it were, on a "need to know" basis. The account of the sociopolitical structures within which local Fenians and Ribbonmen contended is neither methodical nor sustained. Thus, while individual Tyrone parliamentary elections feature at several points in the book, there is no comprehensive attempt to provide an overview of the dynamics of the county's constituencies. Lack of concern with this rather important aspect of political life is further suggested by the statement that "larger Catholic farmers and rural merchants" were "newly franchised by household suffrage in 1884" (p. 3). In fact, even tenants of middling-sized farms had obtained the vote in 1850, and the 1884 act considerably extended the electorate to embrace most heads of households, including small farmers and laborers.

Under the Local Government Act of 1898, elections to local councils occurred every three years. With mention on page eleven of a Fenian in Dungannon gaining frequent election to local office on a labor ticket, hopes are raised of an exploration of a little-visited arena of radical politics. In the event, there is scarcely an overview of the number of local authorities in the county. This deficiency is all the more surprising in light of the appointment in 1913 of the most prominent of the county's Fenians, Patrick McCartan, to the office of dispensary doctor, which was in the gift of his local political opponents. Surely an illuminating story must lie behind this. Even the information about the Tyrone Fenians is not marshaled and probed as it might have been. What did they typically do at meetings? Take orders or agree on tactics? Make financial contributions or expect money from America? Despite the restricted character of the questions posed by this book, and of the methodology pursued, this is a very welcome addition to the literature.

R. V. COMERFORD
National University of Ireland, Maynooth

ANDREW DAVID STEDMAN. Alternatives to Appeasement: Neville Chamberlain and Hitler's Germany. New York: I. B. Tauris. 2011. Pp. x, 308. $99.00.

The discourse surrounding appeasement goes round and round but always returns to Neville Chamberlain. For seventy years Chamberlain has too often been the object of an historical game of pin the calumny on the donkey. He has been characterized as weak, naïve, cowardly, baleful, arrogant, and foolish. His attempt to avoid the human disaster of World War II, his protean policy of appeasement—which, as Andrew David Stedman demonstrates in this book, was never singular in its approach—has been pilloried. Contemporary critics and postwar armchair strategists have disparaged and reimagined every jot and spasm of Chamberlain's relatively short term in office (May 1937–May 1940). So, given appeasement's demonstrable failure to prevent World War II, is it necessary to weigh the merits (or demerits) of other paths not taken? Stedman certainly thinks so.

Stedman's title perfectly encapsulates the contents of his book. The historiographical debate concerning appeasement has been predicated on the assumption that viable alternatives to that policy existed. Stedman sets out to explore the validity of that assumption by investigating those posited alternatives. If such an investigation calls upon readers to consider counterfactuals, then Stedman is prepared to accept any criticism for this approach. It should be pointed out in his defense (if he needs one) that all standard critiques of appeasement are just as dependent on, in fact could not exist without, counterfactual claims.

In six chapters the author consecutively explicates various strategies for dealing with Nazi Germany in the later 1930s: isolation/pacifism, economic and colonial concessions, mobilization of the League of Nations, classic alliance diplomacy, massive rearmament, and threatening or executing preemptive war. Stedman employs contemporaneous statements advocating each of these policies drawn from parliamentary speeches, private correspondence, official documents, and newspaper copy. Then, in each chapter he evaluates the claims and considers whether, or to what extent, Chamberlain and his National Government considered these alternative policies. Stedman also tries to assess just how realistic these policies were in their given context. Overall, his chapters are clear and credible. At no point does he mock or denigrate those who held alternative policies, although he believes some of them (isolation and preventative war) were unlikely either to marshal a broad enough appeal in British society to be implemented or to have much chance of succeeding as real-world policies. It is unfortunate that in his chapter on rearmament Stedman does not make use of Joseph A. Maiolo's The Royal Navy and Nazi Germany, 1933–1939: A Study in Appeasement and the Origins of the Second World War (1998) or G. A. H. Gordon's British Seapower and Procurement between the Wars: A Reappraisal of Rearmament (1988), two excellent sources that would have added depth to his overview and reinforced his argument.

Stedman's conclusion, simply put, is that no policy advocated by the critics of Chamberlain was likely to have led to a better result. For those opposed to appeasement, "it was difficult to suggest a constructive, coherent alternative that he [Chamberlain] could have pursued" (p. 232). Adolf Hitler turned out to be a leader who could in no lasting way be forced off his course. Hitler could neither be appeased nor deterred, and he was always prepared to fight. It is almost impossible to imagine a scenario in which Hitler was cowed into quiescence. Since most critiques of appeasement are based on the premise that Hitler could have been "stopped," they are as unrealistic as appeasement itself. The only imaginable course open to Britain with a greater likelihood of a positive outcome was jettisoning any hope for peace in 1937 and turning Britain into a garrison state with a command economy and a censored press committed to inevitable war with Germany. What possibility existed for Chamberlain—for anyone—to have accomplished that?

Yet appeasement served a greater purpose. It established beyond a shadow of a doubt who was for war and who for peace, and landed the responsibility for World War II decisively on Germany's shoulders. This allowed Britain and its Dominions to go to war largely united, with a clear understanding of who the aggressor was and a sense that they were making sacrifices in a good cause. Stedman's book brings a clear eye to the debates surrounding British foreign policy in the brief Chamberlain era. He sketches out the contours of a more illuminating debate (for his chapters could all use further elaboration) that we can hope will follow on the heels of this valuable text.

JAMES P. LEVY
Hofstra University

NATASHA VALL. Cultural Region: North East England, 1945–2000. New York: Manchester University Press. 2011. Pp. 178. £60.00.

When the Arts Council of Great Britain established its first regional boards in 1960, officials in London declared the Northeast of England to be a "cultural desert" (p. 1). Natasha Vall's book goes far in showing both the overwhelming inaccuracy of this generalization and the assumptions that contributed to its articulation. Vall has carved out a position for herself as an authority on the regional identity and cultural landscape of Newcastle and Northumbria and so has good standing from which to survey the scene. Thus equipped, Vall gives readers excellent context for her discussion of the tensions between those who sought to "polish the pitmen" and those who saw the vernacular culture of the people as itself worthy of celebration. Moreover, this study of the cultural policy of northeastern England fits well into the existing literature on northern regional identity, the influence of media in the formation of cultural identity, debates on the north-south divide, and the intersection of class and territorial affiliation.

Vall works chronologically, looking first at local radio broadcasting from the interwar years through the 1950s. This sets the stage well for her more detailed examination of the establishment of Tyne Tees Television in 1959 and its contributions (or lack thereof) to combating the homogenizing aspects of southern—and American—broadcasts. A poet in her own right, Vall also brings an artist's point of view to her inquiries. This is particularly evident in the vivid portraits of many of the players in the struggle for ownership of northeastern culture, which are drawn with a particularly fine brush. In her chapters on Northern Arts (the regional board of the Arts Council of Great Britain) and on “artists and impresarios” between 1959 and 1979, we meet familiar figures, including the modernist poet Basil Bunting (Briggflatts [1965]) and Scott Dobson, author of Larn Yersel Geordie (1969). But Vall also introduces such lesser-known heroes of the arts wars as Connie Pickard, convenor of the Morden Tower poetry circle, who, together with Bunting and her husband, the poet Tom Pickard, was responsible for bringing Gregory Corso and Allen Ginsberg to Newcastle.

Vall is particularly adept at showing how artists in the Northeast adroitly played up the longstanding connections between a strong working-class identity and the resilient tradition of workers' cultural movements in the region, thereby making it easy to enlist the help of local Labour politicians. This was often an easy sell: Arthur Blenkinsop, Labour MP for Newcastle East and the first acting secretary for Northern Arts, had been, in his youth, a member of the People's Theatre of Newcastle. Ted Fletcher, a veteran of the Spanish Civil war and MP for Darlington, was a staunch champion of the cause of a local arts council for the Northeast. Indeed one of the most interesting aspects of Vall's book is the sense of the torch being passed from one generation of dogged cultural warriors to the next—but never far away from the thread of radical politics. For example, in the late 1950s Frank Graham, another veteran of the Spanish Civil War and a consistently active member of the Communist Party, was the publisher of Larn Yersel Geordie and the Geordie Beuks and an active proponent of workers' poetry and workers' theater. In the 1970s, Geoff Gillham helped found Newcastle's Live Theatre, only to leave in 1975 when, upon joining the Workers Revolutionary Party, he insisted that Live Theatre disband and devote all of its funds to working directly for the revolution. Peter Stark, director of Northern Arts in the 1980s, had his roots in community performing and the People's Theatre.

This inquiry into the cultural cohesiveness of the Northeast is all the more interesting given the concomitant lack of economic coherence that has dogged the region, a contrast that Vall exploits in her coda, arguing that if cultural mandarins, both south and north, had sought to use culture as a way of economically regenerating the greater Newcastle area to make it more attractive to investors and consumers, the result had been the establishment of a new industry based in culture itself.

I have one quibble: Vall assumes that her readers have at least a passing familiarity with many of the radio programs (Wot Cheor, Geordie!), songs (“Blaydon Races”), television shows (The Likely Lads, the first season of Auf Wiedersehen, Pet), and other Northumbrian cultural references. In most cases this is quite reasonable, but for more general readers, particularly North Americans, or for those whose area of specialty is not the Northeast of England, a handful of detailed footnotes would have helpfully broadened the reach of an otherwise fine study.

ANDREA GEDDES POOLE
Trent University

MADELEINE DOBIE. Trading Places: Colonization and Slavery in Eighteenth-Century French Culture. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press. 2010. Pp. xv, 336. Cloth $69.95, paper $27.50.

Madeleine Dobie's book “explores the origins, modalities, and historiographical and ethical implications of the cultural invisibility of the colonial world in seventeenth and eighteenth century French culture” (p. 2). What emerges from this exploration is a better understanding of the connection between French colonization and slavery, for Dobie succeeds in illustrating quite effectively how the French colonies were either represented or ignored in works of literature and philosophy, while bringing to the forefront the ongoing concern among scholars about France's reluctance to confront its colonial past.

Dobie's central argument is that although the French Atlantic and Indian Ocean colonies had a significant and demonstrably transformative impact on France's economy and material culture, their existence registered very little in cultural representations. In essence, these colonies have remained relatively peripheral to the writing of French history. Why has this been the case? Dobie posits that while the French colonies were economically important to France, they remained culturally invisible because they were never viewed as an integral part of France. Indeed, France's discomfort with colonial society was such that discourses on colonialism and slavery were relocated and transferred to the Oriental world. Thus, it comes as no surprise that philosophers including Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Voltaire, Montesquieu, and Denis Diderot ignored colonial slavery.

To examine the lack of cultural representation, Dobie divides the book into three parts. Part one, “East meets West,” consists of three chapters that focus on the transposition of colonial slavery onto Oriental culture in the eighteenth century. Rather than attacking the enslavement of Africans in the Americas, European writers criticized slavery in the Orient and North Africa instead. Dobie gives the example of Montesquieu, who attributed the causes of slavery to political despotism and warm climates, and, like other writers such as Jean-François Melon, associated slavery primarily with the Orient.

While literature ignored black slavery, Dobie shows that France benefited economically from the tropical commodities it imported, including tropical hardwoods that were used to make chairs, tables, and armoires adorned with Oriental motifs that resulted in the transformation of French furnishing styles. Photographs of these styles, including solid mahogany armories used in Bordeaux and Nantes, enrich the book. Likewise, the import of cotton and indigo had a positive impact on France's clothing and fashion industry, and occupied a central place in the Encyclopédie of Diderot and Jean Le Rond d'Alembert. In the end, Dobie attributes the pattern of effacement and projection to a lack of themes or images through which colonial society could be portrayed, the culture of slavery in the colonies, or perhaps the challenge of representation that the colonies presented. What should not be lost sight of, however, is that Europeans in the colonies were vastly outnumbered by blacks, believed that they were under siege, and responded with cruelty and naked racism. The absence of representation is therefore rooted in racism, and this Dobie seems to sidestep.

Part two, "Savages and Slaves," consists of two chapters dedicated primarily to the representation of Native Americans and Africans in seventeenth and eighteenth-century French culture. Here too, the literature is far more sympathetic to the indigenous peoples who "continued to occupy a central place in colonial narrative long after they had been removed from colonized territories, while enslaved Africans occupied a marginal position despite their growing numbers" (p. 131). Dobie rightly notes that the enslaved receive scant treatment in the early histories written by Jean-Baptiste Du Tertre and Jean-Baptiste Labat, and by French missionaries as well. And later works revolve mostly around relationships between Europeans and Native Americans. Such is the case with "Inkle and Yarico"—stories written between 1604 and 1830 that portray a love affair between a European and a Native American; Cleveland (1731–1739), a multivolume novel by Antoine-François Prévost that depicts interracial intimacy; and Voltaire's play Alzire, first performed in 1736, about a defeated Aztec people whose ruler converts to Christianity and urges his daughter to do the same and to marry the new Spanish governor.

In part three, "Liberty, Equality, Economy," Dobie constructs two chapters centered on liberal economic theory and charts the transition from silence to discourse in the late 1760s when the colonies and slavery belatedly became topics of representation and debate. She explains that the loss of territories in Canada and Louisiana triggered a re-evaluation of France's colonial policy wherein abolition became central to sustained economic interests. From this period down to the French Revolution, slavery, along with other aspects of colonial policy and administration, was explored in a variety of literary genres such that colonization was no longer a repressed cultural issue, and economic reasoning became a major focus of French antislavery writing.

Well written and intellectually engaging, Trading Places is a model of excellent scholarship. It makes a significant contribution to the literature on slavery and colonialism.

BERNARD MOITT

Virginia Commonwealth University

MATTHEW SHAW. Time and the French Revolution: The Republican Calendar, 1789–Year XIV. (Studies in History: New Series.) Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell Press. London: Royal Historical Society. 2011. Pp. xiii, 189. $90.00.

Matthew Shaw has two principal goals in this short study of the republican calendar introduced by French revolutionaries in 1793. The first is to challenge the dominant understanding of the calendar, prevalent among historians since the time of François-Alphonse Aulard, that the Jacobins adopted it mainly as an element of the dechristianizing campaign of the Year II. The second, more ambitious, is to attempt "a 'history of time' during the last decade of the eighteenth century" (p. 9). Shaw does not quite succeed in that second ambition. Indeed, in those sections of the introduction in which he attempts to establish a conceptual framework for that discussion, the prose is often convoluted and elusive, and the argument far from clear. But in his aim to explore the practical consequences and implications of the revolutionary calendar Shaw is much more straightforward and succinct, and his prose is often a pleasure to read. In the end one learns a great deal in this volume about the calendar and its cultural implications.

As Shaw notes, in Aulard's account "the calendar was the most antichristian innovation of the entire Revolution, potentially uniting a rather incoherent programme of popular dechristianisation with elite secularism and deism" (p. 45). Shaw proposes a broader context, observing that already in 1789 there were those who began to speak of "the First Year of Liberty" (p. 33). Rather than seeing it as the linchpin of dechristianization, one might better consider the calendar alongside the redrawing of the map of France, which led to the creation of the départements that we still know today, and the effort to rationalize weights and measures that produced the metric system.

The National Convention endorsed the idea of a republican calendar shortly after it convened and assigned the task to a commission headed by Charles-Gilbert Romme. Romme, a trained mathematician, sought input from other astronomers and mathematicians, including Joseph-Jérôme Le Français de Lalande, Gaspard Monge, and Pierre-Simon de Laplace. He found himself with time to devote to the calendar while imprisoned in the Château of Caen by federalist rebels for some weeks in June 1793. The commission delivered its report to the National Convention on September 20, 1793, as the young republic approached its first anniversary, and the deputies adopted it within two weeks. It was made effective retroactively, with the first day of Year I designated to have been September 22, 1792, the day on which the First Republic had been declared.

As Shaw notes, the National Convention initially adopted the new calendar (composed of twelve months consisting of thirty days each, and five supplementary days, which came to be known as sans-culottides), without naming the months. It is thus that the poet, Fabre d'Églantine, is sometimes credited with having crafted the republican calendar, for it was his committee that proposed the names of the months in a report dated October 24, 1793, which the National Convention quickly adopted. The names of the months were classical in inspiration: messidor, the month of harvest (June/July); thermidor, the month of heat (July/August); fructidor, the month of fruit (August/September). Most students of the French Revolution are familiar in some degree with this republican calendar. Fewer are aware that the National Convention also adopted a decimal clock, with each day divided into ten hours of one hundred minutes, each consisting of one hundred seconds. Indeed, on the day of his arrest (9 Thermidor Year II, which Shaw misidentifies as Year IV), Louis-Antoine-Léon de Saint-Just was carrying a decimal timepiece that he had purchased from the shop of A. Elyor, located in the Galerie de l'Egalité, formerly the Palais-Royal (p. 122).

As with the renaming of formerly royal buildings and squares, the introduction of the republican calendar was intended to contribute to the regeneration of the French people. In this goal, Shaw concludes, it was a failure. Decimal time was jettisoned by the end of Year IV. The calendar endured until 1806, so that the Louisiana Purchase is recorded in French documents according to the republican calendar. For just more than a decade, all government business was conducted and recorded according to the new calendar, but the degree to which daily life conformed to the reform is less clear. Shaw notes that departmental authorities adopted the new calendar with little protest, and committee meetings, court sessions, local markets, and Jacobin clubs all shifted accordingly. But no legislation ever mandated that individuals adopt the republican calendar in their personal lives, and many did not. It is commonly asserted that the peasantry by and large refused to accept the décadi, which replaced Sundays, but Shaw found evidence that some peasants chose to observe both, thereby gaining two extra days of rest in most months (p. 103).

While the republican calendar did not endure, it did leave a legacy. Those who sought to sustain the revolutionary tradition made reference to the calendar throughout the nineteenth century, most notably Émile Zola in the title of his best-known novel, Germinal (1885).

PAUL R. HANSON
Butler University

SARAH A. CURTIS. Civilizing Habits: Women Missionaries and the Revival of French Empire. New York: Oxford University Press. 2010. Pp. viii, 373. $74.00.

This fine monograph is Sarah A. Curtis's second book. The first was Educating the Faithful: Religion, Schooling, and Society in Nineteenth-Century France (2000). In between, she co-edited a tome on identities in nineteenth-century France, and published a chapter and an article based directly on the material gathered for the current book. These publications and articles on other church issues positioned her well to bring this latest work to fruition.

The major foci of Civilizing Habits are the lives and works of three strong-willed female Catholic religious missionary leaders of the early nineteenth century and their interactions with indigenous peoples, church officials, local colonial authorities, Protestants, and Muslims. There are three core chapters for each of the protagonists: Rose-Philippine Duchesne, a founding member of the Religious of the Sacred Heart, who did her ministry in the Mississippi Valley; Emilie de Vialar, foundress of the Soeurs de Saint Joseph de l'Apparition, who worked in Algeria, Tunisia, Malta, and on the edge of the Ottoman Empire; and Anne-Marie Javouhey, foundress of the Soeurs de Saint Joseph de Cluny, who served in French Guiana and Africa. The chapters are replete with details on the women, the differing contexts in which they worked, and their struggles and achievements or lack thereof. Curtis's thesis is that these women were not only the beneficiaries of a transformation in the postrevolutionary church that allowed women to create active (as opposed to solely cloistered) religious orders; they were also major contributors to the "Second French [overseas] Empire," which actually began in the early decades of the nineteenth century when sisters in the active orders took their new ministry to "uncivilized" lands.

In committing themselves to spreading the faith, caring for the sick, and educating the needy, Duchesne, de Vialar, and Javouhey advanced the "civilizing mission" and helped restore the Roman Catholic Church by attracting significantly greater numbers of young women who wanted to do something meaningful with their lives and were pleased to do this under capable leaders who could navigate the limitations of their locales and challenges to their authority from local priests or bishops (often by taking advantage of new church regulations that allowed them to secure authorization for their orders directly from Rome). Indeed, the new women's religious orders (almost four hundred were founded in France between 1800 and 1880) became the dominant mode of French missionary activity. By the second half of the century, the sisters were "outnumbering male clergy (priests and brothers) three to two" (p. 7). While not a significant proportion of the French female population, these sisters were absolutely crucial to the French imperial enterprise—a fact fully appreciated by the contemporary French national government, but not by subsequent historians until now.

Civilizing Habits adds nicely to the pioneering work of Claude Langlois's Le catholicisme au féminin: Les congrégations françaises à supérieure générale au XIXe

siècle (1984), which first documented the huge increase in women religious and women's orders in nineteenth-century France. But while other historians have tended to focus on a single female missionary leader, this book studies three, following them to different ends of the French imperial reach in order to get a broader understanding of their impact. This ambitious objective is backed by research from thousands of the leaders' letters and from documents in nineteen different archives, including those in areas where Duchesne, de Vialar, and Javouhey cared for French and indigenous populations. Moreover, there is a very substantial secondary source base for this book from four intersecting areas—religious, political, gender, and colonial history—to tell the story in its multifaceted reality.

There are some stylistic speed bumps in the early pages of the book, and I wonder if Curtis could have actually spoken here of “zeal” in these sisters. Hélène de Chappotin (1839–1904), foundress of the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary, once noted that she had been bent on becoming a Joan of Arc for Henry V until she heard the Bishop of Natchez tell tales of “savages” who “knew neither Jesus nor Mary.” Evidence provided later in Curtis's text seems to support use of this helpful word. Further, I would have suggested removing references to the sisters as “shock troops” (p. 15) and their services being comparable to the “welfare state” of the twentieth century (p. 7). Lastly, additional context to some opening statements, such as finding the sisters' views “paradoxical” when they saw all people “equal in the sight of God . . . [but] only . . . [if those people fully accepted] a religion that remained bounded by European cultural assumptions” (p. 17), would have been helpful. Otherwise, the book is very well written and contextualized, and it is a valuable contribution to our literature on both the Roman Catholic Church and French imperialism.

SANDRA HORVATH-PETERSON
Georgetown University

M. BRADY BROWER. Unruly Spirits: The Science of Psychic Phenomena in Modern France. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press. 2010. Pp. xxvii, 202. Cloth $85.00, paper $30.00.

M. Brady Brower's book is a captivating history of French spiritism from the mid-nineteenth century to the interwar period. Spiritism represents an attempt, usually orchestrated by mediums in the setting of a séance, to contact the spirit world through table rappings, automatic messages, telepathy, the movement of tables and other objects, and the materialization of spirit forms. Inspired by the Fox sisters' experiences with rapping noises in their house in New York in 1848, spiritism first became popular in France in 1853. Unlike other works, such as John Warne Monroe's Laboratories of Faith: Mesmerism, Spiritism, and Occultism in Modern France (2008), which examine the topic primarily from a religious point of view, Brower investigates spiritism's relationship with the scientific community.

Instead of dismissing psychic phenomena as reflections of superstition, many philosophers, scientists, doctors, and intellectuals tried to ascertain their material reality and discover a physical explanation for them by means of a clinical, experimental approach. These individuals launched a new study of mental phenomena called “psychical research” and set up institutions and journals devoted to it. Brower demonstrates that in their search for a scientific basis for psychic phenomena, these scholars became very aware of the problem of subjectivity in both the medium and the observers. Their interesting debates, which Brower covers in depth, helped dismantle Victor Cousin's belief in a unitary self—a belief that had dominated French psychology for most of the nineteenth century. Psychical researchers discovered processes in the mind that were unseen and involuntary, undermining Cousin's method of introspection. In this way, these scholars paved the way for Freudian psychoanalysis, which came late to France, in the 1920s.

In 1857, Allan Kardec launched spiritism as a new religion, insisting at the same time that it was a science. After the establishment of the Third Republic in 1871, various groups began to examine more systematically the scientific basis of spiritism, reflecting the fact that the new government was promoting secularism and science partly as a way to legitimize its own existence. Anticlerical republican scholars aimed to gather solid scientific reasons to expose spiritism as a superstition, fraud, and menace to public health. In response, spiritists claimed they could use experimental methods to prove the soul's survival after death. Trying to be more objective, some scientists sought to apply scientific methods to psychic phenomena to further their own careers, encourage scientific progress, and help the public by offering socially useful knowledge. Of course, they also risked discrediting their careers by being associated with this suspect movement.

Many prominent intellectuals of the Third Republic, including Henri Bergson and Pierre and Marie Curie, were attracted to psychical research. Some promoted it actively. Pierre Janet was a philosopher, doctor, and psychologist, who believed that research into “mediumism” could shed light on the multiple selves that made up a subject and the problem of the unconscious, which was still poorly understood. In 1900, he, along with Charles-Robert Richet, who won a Nobel Prize in physiology, had a large role in founding the Institut psychique internationale, which later changed its name to Institut général psychologique. For the next thirty years, researchers tried to measure objectively the material aspects of psychical phenomena in order to eliminate the observers' subjective errors of perception and mediums' use of fraud. Their efforts intensified in the period after World War I, when interest in spiritism peaked as people sought messages from their dead loved ones. A new organization was founded: Institut métapsychique internationale. Richet served as honorary president. He and other scientists faced intractable problems. How could scientific controls be imposed on mediums without alienating them or disrupting their work? How could scientists escape subjective mistakes in their observations and also reproduce their experiments with mediums? It seemed that the public and other scientists had to have faith in these scientific observers, who in turn had to have faith in mediums. Given the mediated aspect of psychic experiences, certainty remained elusive. In the end, neither the scientific community at large nor the skeptical public was won over to the enterprise.

As enthusiasm for psychical research ebbed in the 1920s and 1930s because of these epistemological impasses, Freudianism became more popular. Freudians countered the psychic researchers' and French psychologists' focus on doing objective experiments and embraced the problem of subjectivity, which now became an object of knowledge for the first time. The indeterminate nature of the subjective, which the psychic researchers had discussed at length as a problem, now became a way to deepen one's understanding of the individual and his or her unconscious. Brower does an outstanding job showing how French psychology developed from a philosophy of the mind to become a real science.

MARY PICKERING

San Jose State University

ELIZABETH CAMPBELL KARLSGODT. Defending National Treasures: French Art and Heritage under Vichy. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press. 2011. Pp. xv, 382. $60.00.

Historians have understood for some time that Adolf Hitler and most other National Socialist leaders regarded themselves as men of culture and devoted an inordinate amount of time and resources to cultural matters—including art plundering. In this compelling and well-researched monograph, Elizabeth Campbell Karlsgodt shows that the leaders of Vichy also privileged cultural matters, with distinctive characteristics that grew out of a particular French tradition.

The notion of French cultural superiority lay at or near the heart of the Vichy ideology. Campbell Karlsgodt begins her book with a discussion of the term le patrimoine: patrimony, to be sure, but often an even more freighted word. For most Vichy leaders, the term applied to cultural heritage: artworks, antiquities, and historic landmarks, usually predating 1900 (p. 5). This patrimoine artistique that Campbell Karlsgodt explores became a focal point of Vichy policy and indeed formed part of the ideological foundation of the "National Revolution." Vichy officials, who understood the arts as the nation's last remaining comparative advantage, sought to place France's cultural heritage in control of the state, which in turn would protect and promote this heritage in a way that would restore the economy (tourism) and help the French "reclaim lost grandeur" (p. 103). Cultural policy, therefore, took center stage in Vichy, and high expectations were not uncommon, with conservative officials also seeing them as an "antidote to a wide-range of destructive social trends" (p. 5).

The reality is that Vichy officials spent most of their time contending with the crises relating to the German victory and the ongoing war, and cultural policy often entailed mitigating the damage. The example of the smelting of statues provides an apt example. Civic statuary had flourished in the nineteenth century, although many of the works lacked artistic merit. The Germans made demands on the French for raw materials, and rather than destroy church bells, Vichy officials turned to these bronze statues (p. 148). What is so striking is that the French undertook the selection and destruction themselves. Although this topic has been studied by a number of scholars, including Kirrily Freeman in a 2009 monograph, Campbell Karlsgodt, who carried out impressive archival research in Paris, Chambéry, and Nantes, adds an original analysis of what was destroyed and saved. The evacuation of artworks from museums to provincial chateaux and other repositories is also handled deftly.

Campbell Karlsgodt takes up familiar cases regarding art plundering and examines them from the French perspective. She is most intrigued by what museum professionals and cultural officials did when faced with an opportunity to integrate looted Jewish collections into the Louvre and other national museums. Her analysis reveals a strong element of opportunism on the part of French museum and state officials, but also a rationalization grounded in the nationalistic cultural policies of Vichy. The art collection of Adolphe Schloss, the object of intense competition between the Germans and the French, offers a key example. Vichy Prime Minister Pierre Laval helped broker a deal in which the Germans obtained 262 works, while the French obtained 49 paintings. Campbell Karlsgodt argues—with compelling evidence—that René Huyghe, the director of paintings at the Louvre, and Jacques Jaujard, the now legendary director of the French national museums, believed they were adding to the museum's holdings on a permanent basis. Although the episode has been treated by others, Campbell Karlsgodt adds new evidence countering official claims, which became part of the narrative in the postwar period, that Huyghe, Jaujard, and many of their colleagues pursued fictional acquisitions to keep the works out of German hands (pp. 215–216). She avoids the Manichean categories of resistance and collaboration and writes about her subjects with an appreciation of the complexity of their experiences.

In a similar vein, Campbell Karlsgodt explores the legacy of Vichy, noting continuities in many areas concerning culture and heritage. The urgency of the war, and especially the years 1940–1942, had created an excellent opportunity for the development of policy concerning cultural patrimony. Much of the subsequent postwar cultural heritage legislation extended the Vichy-initiated policies, thereby enhancing the state's control over cultural patrimony. In other areas regarding Vichy's cultural legacy, it was more a case of quiet neglect (or even active repression). In the postwar period, for example, French officials gave the impression that all the recovered property that could be restituted had indeed been returned. This, as journalist Hector Feliciano first reported in the mid-1990s, was not true: some two thousand high-quality paintings, referred to by the acronym MNR (musées nationaux récupération)—had been held in trusteeship by the French state for decades. Campbell Karlsgodt again updates the story and adds an admirable critical perspective, asking “to what extent did anti-Semitism play a role in the long-term guardianship?” (p. 13).

Campbell Karlsgodt could have said more on the fate of real estate that was seized from Jews. At the same time of the MNR scandal in the mid-1990s, a parallel development occurred with regard to “Aryanized” Jewish real estate that had been declared heirless and that was now controlled (and sometimes inhabited) by friends of government officials. Campbell Karlsgodt offers insightful observations about the Mattéoli Commission on Holocaust-era assets but ignores the issue of real estate—which, granted, in certain instances would arguably not qualify as cultural patrimony.

Campbell Karlsgodt does a fine job with the historiography of Vichy, offering concise summaries of a rich literature and providing important information in a succinct manner. She also has a knack for explicating evocative moments, such as Marshal Philippe Pétain moving into the Louvre during the Battle of France in 1940 (p. 20), and for including telling statistics, such as the estimate that eighty percent of French art dealers sold works to Germans during the war (p. 227). While very impressive in terms of French sources, and this includes a range of archives, she pays inadequate attention to the German scholarly literature. Because she engages topics like “art as a negotiating tool,” which concern French-German bilateral relations, and German archaeologists in France, there are instances where a wider range of German sources would have been useful.

Overall this is a cogently argued, well-researched, and elegant book. The issue of art and cultural heritage provides a brilliant entrée into the history of France during World War II. Indeed, just as there was a generation of scholars who offered breakthroughs in the study of Vichy beginning in the 1960s, so now there is a “renaissance” focused on the cultural history of wartime France. Campbell Karlsgodt has made an important addition to this burgeoning literature.

JONATHAN PETROPOULOS

Claremont McKenna College

SARA B. PRITCHARD. Confluence: The Nature of Technology and the Remaking of the Rhône. (Harvard Historical Studies, number 172.) Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 2011. Pp. xvii, 371. $49.95.

Since the late nineteenth century, a common response to military defeat has been for the vanquished to appropriate modern technologies while interpreting them in terms of longstanding cultural ideals (see Wolfgang Schivelbusch's The Culture of Defeat: On National Trauma, Mourning, and Recovery [2003]). After humiliating collapse in World War II, postwar France undertook a vast set of engineering projects to reconstruct and modernize the nation, not only for practical purposes but also for compelling displays of renewed national glory.

Thus began the transformation of the Rhône in the four decades after the war. It had long been an unruly river, prone to flooding, so projects to manage it were hardly new. In 1921 the French state established a river authority, the Compagnie Nationale du Rhône (CNR), which during the interwar years led a public-private partnership to make improvements that would balance the needs of various sectors (navigation, agriculture, industry, hydroelectric power) as well as local, regional, and national interests.

In her fine first book, Sara B. Pritchard emphasizes that after the war more radical concepts of human intervention led to plans not just to manage the river, but to reconstruct it according to human desires. At a time when France was starved for energy, power production using “white coal” was given top priority. This led to the enormous hydroelectric project of Donzère-Mondragon carried out between 1947 and 1952, described by Pritchard in fascinating and lucid detail. Within forty years after the war, nineteen hydroelectric projects were built between Lyon and Marseille, as well as six nuclear power plants. At the same time the river waters were also tapped for increasing industrial and agricultural production.

The story arc of Confluence is one of strong postwar national agreement on rebuilding the Rhône, followed by gradual loss of confidence and consensus as competing interests grew stronger and as unintended consequences, especially regarding groundwater hydrology, became more evident. Pritchard carefully traces evolving views and priorities as embodied in different institutions and groups on the national, regional, and local scales.

In the late 1960s came the great postwar turn in the West—evident in so many areas of common life within just a few years—questioning the whole direction and scope of technological interventions in the world. From the 1970s on, increasing attention was given to rehabilitation measures promising to restore the “former Rhône” to higher ecological quality, renewed fish migration, and some modicum of aesthetic appeal. This new consciousness was expressed in “the path-breaking water law of 1992,” which declared that “water is part of the common patrimony of the nation” that needs to be protected, improved, and developed as a “useable resource” with respect to its “natural equilibriums” (p. 247).

As Pritchard points out, there is still plenty of room for conflict in this declaration. By the time it was pronounced, almost all the postwar projects planned for the Rhône had been completed. The main practical effect of new attitudes was to shelve an ambitious plan to build a modern connection between the Rhine and the Rhône. Pritchard notes, however, that while the “high modernist” approach to rivers receded in France, it was thriving in the postcolonial world, often with consulting assistance from technical staff associated with the CNR.

Pritchard has done an enormous amount of archival research, especially in the holdings of the CNR, and has carefully assembled evidence involving multiple organizations, large and small, private and public, local and regional and national. This is primarily an institutional history but an exceptionally broad and deep one. French historians should pair Pritchard’s Confluence with Gabrielle Hecht’s acclaimed Radiance of France: Nuclear Power and National Identity after World War II (2009) as studies of postwar history, tout court: history of technology, yes, but with implications far beyond this supposed subfield.

Other obvious audiences are scholars in science, technology, and society (STS), and environmental historians. Pritchard spends an inordinate amount of space outlining the conceptual basis of her work with regard to these groups. While balanced and thoughtful, her discussion has an inside-the-academic-Beltway flavor, considering that the topic is of interest and importance far beyond them.

The main distinction between STS and environmental history is that the latter explicitly acknowledges the factor of time. Confluence presents a rich case study of a controversy, but even more it presents a story about time and the river. The story starts with beaten-down people imagining collective renewal in the vision of a river transformed into a great technological system. As they build their dream, they slowly realize that the system is as imbalanced and imperfect as they are. They come to the realization that they would like to have a second chance, to do it over again in a better way, but they can never step into the same river twice.

ROSALIND WILLIAMS

Massachusetts Institute of Technology

LOTTE VAN DE POL. The Burgher and the Whore: Prostitution in Early Modern Amsterdam. Translated by LIZ WATERS. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. vii, 269. $55.00.

More than a decade and a half ago, Lotte van de Pol published the large-scale study Het Amsterdamsch hoerdom (1996). Within the compass of some 350 pages, van de Pol surveyed and analyzed prostitution in seventeenth- and eighteenth-century Amsterdam. The book, extensively and very favorably reviewed in the Dutch and German press, was widely, and justifiably, considered a “pioneering work.” Prostitution was, even at the time, a fairly well-studied phenomenon among social, feminist, and cultural historians. The book stood out, however, because of its exceedingly strong archival basis, the author’s intimate familiarity with the highs and lows of Amsterdam society, and her rigorously critical examination of several forms of documentation that included legal records, travel guides (such as the eponymous Het Amsterdamsch hoerdom), pamphlets, and belles lettres. Just as valuable in the original was the lengthy and informed discussion (here still present in its essentials) of van de Pol’s principal source: the unusually complete run of Amsterdam Confessieboeken from 1585 to 1811. Out of these for the period between 1650 and 1750, van de Pol combed some 8,099 trials involving 5,784 individuals: 4,633 prostitutes, 898 bawds, and 253 male pimps, panderers, and landlords.

The Burgher and the Whore presents a shortened version of this magisterial contribution and has been somewhat rewritten for an English-speaking audience. This revision, in a crisp translation, streamlines a good deal of the original’s content but does not violate its integrity. While some findings now seem less fresh than they did when first advanced in 1996, others will continue to interest historians of prostitution, gender, women, and the early modern world more generally. It certainly deserves a wide readership among those who have no access to the Dutch original.

An enormous wealth of materials addresses prostitution. For Amsterdam, as van de Pol observes, these are “remarkably numerous and diverse, and they touch both image and reality” (p. 8). The skill with which van de Pol handles this prolixity is masterful especially at troublesome points of intersection. The lines between fictional and nonfiction sources are inevitably blurry. Take, for example, criminal records. Where would historians be without them? Yet, they are deceptively transparent. Qualitative and quantitative details abound in the confession books but require considerable elbow grease to extract and to evaluate. Van de Pol aptly characterizes the materials found in the confession books as “stories,” and she uses them to individualize and humanize the face of prostitution, as well as to construct a quantitative survey. She also employs them to illustrate how stories changed over time, thus allowing her not only to trace the emergence of differing attitudes toward prostitution but also to locate shifts in how authorities vigorously policed, carefully observed, or studiously ignored it. These sources additionally reveal the many locations where prostitution took place and offer a panoramic view of the underbelly of Amsterdam’s society. Because contemporaries considered Amsterdam “the ultimate city of whores,” a great range of fiction, as well as much fiction masquerading as travelogue and guidebook, treats the topic. Van de Pol leads us surefootedly through this “veritable labyrinth” (p. 12). Most notorious of contemporary publications on prostitution was the 1681 Het Amsterdamsch hoerdom that van de Pol uses not as a reliable vade mecum to the music houses and brothels but as a source most fruitful when read in conjunction with, and against, the confession books, pamphlets, laws, and fictional and real biographies or autobiographies. She accepts little at face value. She listens sensitively to stories people told (the prostitutes in the confession books, playwrights and novelists, and pamphleteers, for example) and shows how these, if carefully analyzed and precisely located within the broader sweep of Amsterdam’s history, reveal the hidden, and the not-so-hidden, contours of prostitution.

Many findings in The Burgher and the Whore work for cities other than Amsterdam, yet the city itself and its peculiarities never disappear. The book is, therefore, about Amsterdam prostitution as much as it is about prostitution in Amsterdam. The city was a highly unusual urban environment. It was very large, it was diverse, it was affluent, it had a high percentage of women living alone, and it was a port supporting a large transient and seafaring population. To be sure, other great ports, like Antwerp or Hamburg, or urban conglomerations, like London and Paris, had some similar social and economic structures, but they were not identical to Amsterdam. Thus the face and reality of prostitution differed.

By anchoring Amsterdam prostitution within the city's larger social, economic, legal, political, and religious frameworks, van de Pol highlights critical points. Prostitution in the early modern world differed from prostitution later (or earlier). Even more strikingly, prostitution was big business; it formed a significant segment of the urban economy. In short, "prostitution made money go around" (p. 199) and contributed to a monetary circulation that virtually all eighteenth-century political economists regarded as the wellspring of true prosperity.

Van de Pol has produced a book that succeeds on at least two levels. It is a well-written, lively, accessible history that offers solidly based and appropriately illustrated analyses of the deeper ramifications of "sex for money" and "money for sex" in the early modern world. That prostitution is a business is obvious; that it was a major economic player and therefore involved a very large number of the respectable, the not-so-respectable, and the truly marginal are topics that have not received the attention they are due. Historians have pointed out the social, cultural, and gender implications of prostitution, but they have far less frequently considered it as a major urban institution as critical to the functioning of an entrepôt like Amsterdam as its Exchange or Bank. Van de Pol's ability to develop those larger implications marks The Burgher and the Whore as a sophisticated and exceedingly valuable contribution to the historical literature.

MARY LINDEMANN
University of Miami

EVA GILOI. Monarchy, Myth, and Material Culture in Germany 1750–1950. (New Studies in European History.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. x, 422. $99.00.

Eva Giloi's richly detailed study offers new perspectives on accepted wisdom as well as revisions of modern German historiographical verities in the light of monarchical material culture, specifically the "relics" or royal memorabilia donated or presented as gifts to the Hohenzollern rulers. The book's stated goal is "to plumb the meaning of German loyalism. Which aspects of monarchy did collectors and consumers endorse . . . which competing royal myths did they create through their manipulation of dynastic goods?" (p. 5). Although the title indicates a German scope, the text actually focuses in great depth on the Hohenzollerns and Prussia, with comparative reflections on contemporary European monarchies, particularly Victorian Britain. Giloi uses material culture to reveal the relative distance or accessibility of a monarch to his subjects, based on the kinds of gifts, whether memorabilia or homemade, relics or baked goods.

Thoroughly researched in the archives of the Preussischer Kulturbesitz, particularly in remaining files documenting royal gifts and donations (many were lost in World War II) and contemporary collectors' journals, the chapters follow each nineteenth-century Prussian monarch in turn, linking the ruler's personality to consumer culture tendencies of his time. Giloi also examines the creation of Berlin's wonderful museum complex, from the royal Kunstkammer to the Neues Museum, from Schloss Monbijou to the Hohenzollern Museum. Formidable, influential curators such as Jean Henry, Leopold von Ledebur, and Paul Seidel receive sustained attention. Gifts were not always accepted, particularly when the objects were too intimate (reflecting bodily contact) or if the gift was too similar to existing inventory (yet another of Frederick the Great's snuff boxes). Giloi considers the dynamics of gift giving and political jockeying for position as givers angled for reciprocation, the monarch weighed the consequences of the response, curators sought to reshape museums, and a modern German nation was formed.

Acknowledging that this comes as no surprise, the author finds that the majority of gift givers came from Prussia itself, rather than lands that came under Prussian domination. She also shows that while nobility were predictably regular gift givers, middle-class donors increased, though Catholic donors did not, and the number of upwardly mobile Jewish donors increased even as the number of antisemitic donors grew. Overall, Giloi sees an "affective bond" generated between subjects and monarchs through relic gifts, with intimate objects or handmade gifts finding particularly positive reception during the reigns of Frederick Wilhelm IV and Wilhelm I (p. 141).

The book opens with a vignette describing the gift of one of Queen Luise's garters to a valued courtier, Sophie von Voss (p. 1). The garter's subsequent circulation among nobility and museums offers insight into the sustained popularity of two monarchs: Frederick the Great and Queen Luise. The garter was worn by the queen as she died, and the pathos of this story generated significance for an intimate but otherwise mundane item of clothing. The stories attached to objects, more than the objects themselves, determined their value as more and more teacups sipped from by monarchs, or handkerchiefs used by them, and autographs and signed photographs came on the collectors' market and were given as gifts. Giloi shows that the same kinds of relics found very different receptions over time and could be used to tell quite different stories; they were therefore unstable platforms for nationalist or patriotic messages. Ledebur, the influential curator of the royal Kunstkammer after 1830, considered Frederick the Great's umbilical cord and a cloth bearing the sweat of the dying monarch's brow "gems" of the collection, and so they also appeared later in the Hohenzollern Museum, but the same objects were removed from the relic rooms of the Neues Museum in the years between (p. 151). Wilhelm I's sentimentality appeared to be much more in tune with the Victorian era than Wilhelm II's, and the persistent popularity of Queen Luise played a profound role in what Giloi refers to as the "Wilhelm-Luise dyad" (pp. 167–185), with Wilhelm I's strong domestic sensibility complementing a Luise cult that emphasized Germany's victim status even after the victories of 1870. Donations on anniversaries of Luise's life and death increased continually until World War I, paving the way, Giloi argues, for a vision of Germany as "a victim in need of rescue" (p. 324). Frederick's and Luise's popularity ultimately created "an iconographic compression that became toxic for their descendants as it gave them little room for diversion into alternate political symbols" (p. 333). In the author's terms, the Hohenzollerns' role in the development of German nationalism becomes more complex.

In a book focused on material, particularly visual culture representations of monarchical myths, it is particularly regrettable that the illustrations are poorly handled. Textual references to figures occur out of order, and in the first two instances refer to figures incorrectly. The majority of the images are more appropriately referenced, but this careless use of illustration creates easily avoidable confusion to the detriment of the main arguments, which themselves are sound and well supported.

SUSAN A. CRANE
University of Arizona

LISA FETHERINGILL ZWICKER. Dueling Students: Conflict, Masculinity, and Politics in German Universities, 1890–1914. (Social History, Popular Culture, and Politics in Germany.) Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press. 2011. Pp. ix, 296. $75.00.

Lisa Fetheringill Zwicker's book is a useful reminder to historians of Germany that while the Sonderweg may no longer be in fashion, its impact can still be felt. She reassesses the view of German universities as bastions of conservative, antisemitic, and radical nationalist thought. There can be no doubt that all of these sentiments existed in German universities; however, through a thorough examination of university archives and student publications, both newspapers and pamphlets, as well as letters and memoirs, Zwicker convincingly proves that the standard view is in need of revision. She has done this by focusing on a fundamental aspect of student life in Germany: student fraternities and associations.

After an introduction outlining the historiography as well as the resources, method, and intentions of the book, the author launches into a discussion of student life in Wilhelmine Germany. Students considered themselves to be the intellectual aristocracy of the nation and those with the economic means comported themselves as such. Friedrich Nietzsche's scornful account of student drinking and dueling was by no means unique. Zwicker demonstrates that there was more going on than Nietzsche and other critics realized. The admission of women and the increasing number of students from the middle class changed the dynamic of student life at universities. The author's examination of the Burschenschaft, the Corps, the Union of German Students, Jewish and Catholic fraternities or associations, and the Free Student associations reveal a lively and diverse student culture where the liberal idea of intellectual freedom held tremendous sway. Individual chapters cover the above-mentioned groups. The first two chapters cover the Corps and the Burschenschaft, the two oldest and most exclusive fraternities at German universities. Zwicker shows that the ritualized drinking and dueling associated with German fraternities were tied to notions of masculinity. The regulation of the duel was supposedly a matter of honor, but it was also a method of exclusion. Fraternities had contracts with other fraternities and determined which people were worthy of obtaining satisfaction. Women were excluded from this ritual, as were the vast majority of students with modest means. In this manner, the Corps and the Burschenschaft attempted to claim supremacy among students, a claim that did not go unchallenged.

The Union of German Students, Catholic fraternities and associations, and Jewish fraternities all vied for respect and influence on university matters. Perhaps the most important were the Free Student associations. These were students who did not belong to any fraternity and represented the plurality, if not the majority, of students at German universities. These groups all fought for and eventually won places on university student councils, although when and where varied. Jewish fraternities and Catholic fraternities and associations were particular targets of other fraternities at this time and are the subject of their own chapters. Chapter six looks at the limits of antisemitism in German universities. Zwicker argues that after a spike of antisemitic activity in the mid-1890s, this was not a driving issue for student groups. The memoirs of Jewish students and Jewish student publications do not make an issue of antisemitism, although it pervaded the experiences of Jewish students.

Chapter eight examines the academic Kulturkampf against Catholic organizations at universities. Dredging up the language of Otto von Bismarck's Kulturkampf, Catholic student organizations were banned on many universities because they were exclusionary and political, thus dividing the nation instead of uniting it. Moreover, critics claimed that Catholicism limited academic discourse and research. Zwicker identifies the default Protestantism of German university culture as well as the fundamental conflict between the ideals of liberalism, including freedom of conscience, expression, and association, and liberalism's anti-Catholicism. The academic Kulturkampf produced the same results as Bismarck's. Catholic students became more united and more politicized because of the attack on their religion. Debates held within and among the various student groups generally had a democratic character. Zwicker proves convincingly that German student groups were more liberal and more democratic than the historiography has indicated.

There are two important strengths in this work. First, there is a careful recognition of the differences at the various German universities; not all universities were equally antisemitic or anti-Catholic. Second, Zwicker offers an insightful discussion of notions of masculinity and how groups who were excluded from dueling could offer a competing notion of masculinity. The account of student activism shows that not all German students were apolitical. The book also provides an interesting glimpse into the richness of student life at universities and through the occasional comparison to English and American universities at the time reminds readers that there was a good reason that so many from both of those nations decided to study in Germany.

TROY R. E. PADDOCK

Southern Connecticut State University

SCOTT STEPHENSON. The Final Battle: Soldiers on the Western Front and the German Revolution of 1918. (Studies in the Social and Cultural History of Modern Warfare.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 2009. Pp. xvi, 354. $99.00.

The German revolution of 1918—if, indeed, it was a revolution at all—did not lead to a stable democracy, and the army was one of the centers of opposition to the democratic idea in the Weimar Republic. This is a bit of a conundrum, because the revolution started in the armed forces and they did not fight to stop the spread of the revolution, although in January 1919 the army did put down the Spartacist uprising with exemplary violence. Scott Stephenson attempts to explain this conundrum by closely examining the soldiers on the western front in 1918, their experiences in the last months of the war, their orderly march back home, and their role in the critical months of late 1918 and early 1919. As he states in his preface, the author is a former soldier who now teaches at the U.S. Army Command and General Staff College. He has great sympathy with soldiers, especially with the “front hogs” of the German trenches of 1918, and his empathy serves him well in describing how they felt and interpreted their experiences.

At the outset he makes an important distinction between the front-line troops and the rest. Although exhausted and tired, the front-line troops on the western front were still a powerful and well-disciplined force. For example, in the revolution the front-line troops did not remove their officers as did the majority of the German occupation units in the east. Front-line troops experienced the German revolution as a “chasm that separated those who served behind the line and those who had endured the terrible experience of service in the trenches of the Western Front in the last stages of the war” (p. 6). This division is at the heart of the book.

Stephenson begins his story in October 1918, with a chapter on the German soldiers on the western front in the last month of the war. He describes the soldiers' morale, their exhaustion, their isolation, their alienation, and the importance of camaraderie and cohesion in sustaining their fighting spirit. This chapter is a superb account of the psychology of the “front hogs.” In the next chapter he describes how this army, which was still willing to fight the enemy, was not willing to fight for the Kaiser against other German troops. The perspective shifts here to the officers at Spa, but Stephenson never loses sight of the men in the trenches. He notes that, ultimately, “by their unwillingness to fight for the monarchy . . . they became key agents in the revolution's first and greatest victory, the abdication of the Kaiser” (p. 108).

The next few chapters focus on how the army on the western front was brought home. The officers accomplished the difficult task of maintaining order during retreat through the force of their personalities and the soldiers' camaraderie (Stephenson uses the term cohesion) with enlisted men and their officers. This is an important revision of an older thesis put forward by Wilhelm Deist, who argued that the army simply dissolved after the armistice in 1918, with soldiers deserting as they returned home. Finally, in late November and December 1918, the troops arrived back in Germany, where the vast majority were demobilized in a relatively organized fashion. But not all of them were demobilized. Stephenson's examination of how the troops that remained were chosen, organized, and led, and the role they played in the last phases of the revolution of 1918 as a force for a certain sort of law and order in Germany, is one of the most interesting and perceptive parts of the book, especially as it is told largely from the perspective of the army, a perspective that is quite rare in modern German historiography. Unfortunately, the book ends there.

The book's strength and its weakness lie with the author's perspective. There is no better account of the soldiers' morale, of the efforts taken by the officers to sustain morale, and of the officers' mindset in the revolution in 1918. Yet that is not quite enough. To cite just one example: in his chapter on how the military put down the Spartacist uprising, “The Last Battle,” Stephenson offers what is ultimately a sympathetic portrayal of Captain Waldemar Pabst. Yet this same Pabst gave the order to murder Karl Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg, actively fought the Weimar democratic system throughout the 1920s, and contributed in no small manner to the end of Weimar and the rise of the Nazis. (It would have been interesting, for example, if the book had ended not with the Spartacist Uprising but with the Kapp Putsch.) It may very well be that what defined a good officer and an effective fighting force in late 1918—and certainly Pabst was an effective officer—was also inherently dangerous to the new democracy: in other words, that the problem was not the old but the new militarism. Even if there is no direct link from 1918 to 1933, there is some connection, and the author needs to reflect more on this. Stephenson has written a perceptive and interesting account of the history of the end of the war and the German revolution of 1918 from the soldier's perspective. The lack of a broader discussion of this perspective in the context of German militarism is a real pity.

JEFFREY VERHEY
Humboldt University

JULIA ROOS. Weimar through the Lens of Gender: Prostitution Reform, Woman's Emancipation, and German Democracy, 1919–33. (Social History, Popular Culture, and Politics in Germany.) Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press. 2010. Pp. viii, 314. $70.00.

At first sight this work seems to be a conventional history from above about a narrow topic. Unlike Victoria Harris's Selling Sex in the Reich: Prostitutes in German Society, 1914–1945 (2010), which focuses on the experience of sex workers themselves, Julia Roos is concerned with the changing regulation of prostitution from Wilhelmine to Weimar to Nazi Germany. But she offers much more. This book is a meticulously researched study of the factors behind the successful passage of the 1927 Law For Combating Venereal Diseases, undoubtedly the most important new hygiene law in the Weimar Republic, and one that contained the most tolerant prostitution policies in the West. It decriminalized prostitution, outlawed brothels, gave prostitutes better rights to work, and ended the double standard of sexual morality that held women alone responsible for the spread of venereal disease. Roos's ambitions, however, are larger. First, using the example of prostitution, she seeks to reassess the impact of the women's movement and its allies on the political left in transforming the old patriarchal order into a much more equal gender order. Like a number of recent studies by, for example, Atina Grossmann, Kathleen Canning, and this reviewer, she takes issue with the well-known negative judgments of the women's movement by historians such as Richard J. Evans, Renate Bridenthal, Claudia Koonz, Ute Frevert, and Karen Hagemann. Second, Roos boldly claims, as her title indicates, that only through the lens of gender can we truly understand why the Weimar project ultimately failed. Based on her close scrutiny of the battle to reform prostitution, she claims that liberalization mobilized "anti-democratic sentiments and opposition" and thereby significantly contributed to the rise of Nazism (p. 4). She argues that "conflicts over gender and sexuality were perhaps as important for the crisis and ultimate demise of the Weimar Republic as class antagonism and the bitter political divisions between Left and Right" (p. 8).

Roos supports her case with evidence from a very wide base of archival and published sources. Rather than discussing gender as discourse, she approaches it as real and a powerful relationship and examines prostitution reform against the background of political and cultural change. Chapter one describes the regulation of prostitution in Wilhelmine Germany and the immediate impact of World War I. Sex workers' views towards regulation are set out in chapter two, which reveals them not as stereotypical passive victims or "degenerates" but as active participants in public debates. But their mobilization in the wake of the 1927 law provoked the moral right and led to vociferous demands for the recriminalization of prostitution. Chapter three examines the campaign by feminists, who joined forces with socialists and sex reformers, to reform prostitution, which culminated in the anti-VD law of 1927. Although Roos underplays the importance of radical feminists like Helene Stöcker by concentrating on the bourgeois women's movement and its Christian counterpart, this chapter nevertheless reveals a more complex and positive image of these women, who have often been dismissed as authoritarian and anti-individualist. Socialists' important role in improving the rights of sex workers is the subject for chapter four, which also discusses the overlap and differences between social democratic and communist activists. The conservative attempt to overturn the more liberal aspects of the 1927 law is the topic of the final chapter. Here, too, we see a deep split between conservative commentators and lawmakers and the Protestant and Catholic women's movement. The latter shared the liberal feminists' deep revulsion at the misogyny enshrined in regulationism. Toward the final years of the republic, however, their fear of a "moral degeneration" led them to support the backlash against the 1927 law and against "sexual bolshevism" in general, i.e. sex reform (including easier access to birth control and abortion). This played into the Nazis' hands and helped them win support among the middle classes.

It is a pity that a study on gender and prostitution lacks a proper discussion of important male players in the debate: customers of sex workers are given considerable attention in Regina Schulte's Sperrbezirke: Tugendhaftigkeit und Prostitution in der bürgerlichen Welt (1979) but are largely absent here; so is the predominantly male medical profession, which, as Lutz Sauerteig has shown in Krankheit, Sexualität, Gesellschaft: Geschlechtskrankheiten und Gesundheitspolitik in Deutschland im 19. und frühen 20. Jahrhundert (1999), played a vital role in prostitution reform. These caveats, however, should not deflect from the very impressive achievements of this book.

CORNELIE USBORNE

University of Roehampton [All reviewers of books by Indiana University history faculty are selected with the advice of the Board of Editors.]

ANNA HOLIAN. Between National Socialism and Soviet Communism: Displaced Persons in Postwar Germany. (Social History, Popular Culture, and Politics in Germany.) Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2011. Pp. vii, 367. $85.00.

Scholarship on the experience of displaced persons (DPs) in postwar Europe has expanded rapidly in recent years. New studies by the historians Gerald Daniel Cohen and Jessica Reinisch on the humanitarian and political context of the DP crisis complement a range of local histories and studies of particular national and ethnic groups within the refugee-haunted world of postwar Europe. Anna Holian's book is an outstanding contribution to this literature. Her transnational study of DP identity artfully merges the "shadow history" of DP life into the wider stream of postwar reconstruction and the emergence of the Cold War international order (p. 2).

This book endeavors to understand the ways that various DP groups—in this case Poles, Ukrainians, Russians, and Jews living in American-occupied Bavaria—came to understand the circumstances and conditions of their displacement. She focuses on DP elites, who formed an endless parade of committees and organizations intent on negotiating with the Allies and Germans on behalf of their national constituencies. While anticommunism and the recent memory of suffering at the hands of the Nazis were core components of their claims for reparations and other benefits, politics within the DP community were also suffused with tensions transported from prewar Eastern Europe. As Holian memorably puts it, "we need to be attentive to where displaced persons came from as well as where they found themselves and where they were going" (p. 26).

These nationalized DP narratives were both convergent and conflicting. Non-Jewish Eastern Europeans emphasized their opposition to and status as victims of Soviet communism, while Jews primarily stressed their experiences under the Nazi empire. DP anticommunism, which could serve to integrate the claims of various East European groups, also fractured over prewar debates about national minorities and the bloody ethnic conflicts in postwar Poland and Ukraine. While anti-communism was certainly common across the DP population after the early wave of mass repatriation, organized anticommunist groups were narrow, divided, and often dominated by nationalists with a wartime history of collaboration with the Germans. Many non-Jewish DP political groups were more or less openly antisemitic and came to resent the Allied and later West German recognition of Jews as particularly deserving of restitution.

Holian makes particularly effective use of records related to DP protests like the anticommunist march in Munich in April 1949 and a demonstration by Jewish DPs on Munich's Möhlstrasse a few months later. Here, the book highlights the very important links among the DP question, the growing self-assertiveness of German authorities, and the transformation of occupation policy as the Cold War deepened and Allied plans for West German sovereignty advanced. The argument that DPs need to be treated as important agents in the creation of the postwar order in Cold War Europe is a particularly important contribution to a rich and growing literature.

One of the challenges that Holian faces in this book is assessing the relationship between DP elites and the millions of ordinary DPs who lived in and out of camps at various times after the war. Here, she is judicious and careful in how she uses evidence and draws a great deal from secondary literature to balance her claims. DP elites, she suggests, were "to an impressive extent" able to shape the debates within DP communities over repatriation to Eastern Europe (p. 87). While Holian helpfully discusses repatriation debates among Jewish DPs, here she focuses on non-Jewish Eastern Europeans. The development of an anticommunist anti-repatriation sentiment eventually began to influence not only DPs but also occupation and relief officials. This shift, which happened within the framework of early Cold War tensions, ultimately helped to make emigration, rather than repatriation, the cornerstone of DP policy.

These are useful insights, but they run the risk of overemphasizing the authority of DP elites. Despite determined opposition from Polish DP leaders, the unsubtly titled Operation Carrot in the summer and fall of 1946 convinced more than 80,000 Poles to go home by offering substantial material support. Some relief officials were convinced that the momentum might have continued but for the coming of an exceptionally hard winter. Occupation and relief authorities also gave anti-repatriation activists a gift when they allowed ill-considered "nationality screening" to take place in the camps that winter, terrifying Eastern European DPs who saw this as a step toward forced repatriation.

Historians working on DPs have always faced the problem of capturing the voices of refugees who had often survived terrible wartime experiences, living in places where they often did not speak the language, and waiting for a chance to go somewhere else. Holian's book does a great deal to help us understand the often subterranean politics of the DP world and to contextualize the DP experience within postwar German and European history. It is an impressive work and deserves a wide readership.

ADAM R. SEIPP
Texas A&M University

CHRISTINA MORINA. Legacies of Stalingrad: Remembering the Eastern Front in Germany since 1945. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2011. Pp. x, 297. $90.00.

Postwar Germany has struggled to deal not only with the genocide of European Jewry, but also with the extreme brutality that Nazi Germany unleashed against the Soviet Union, a campaign that killed some twenty-five million people. Although a large scholarly literature exists on German memories of the Holocaust, surprisingly little has been written on German attempts to confront the legacies of the war on the eastern front. In her comparatively broad and empirically rigorous book, Christina Morina begins to address this lacuna by examining West and East German political discourses about the Nazi war against the Soviet Union from the immediate postwar years to the 1980s (she also includes an epilogue on reunited Germany).

Focusing on what she calls "political memory" (p. 2), Morina analyzes the various ways that leading politicians—chiefly Konrad Adenauer, Willy Brandt, Helmut Kohl, Walter Ulbricht, and Erich Honecker—discussed the war against the Soviet Union. While her book draws on some unpublished material from three archives, it is mostly based on published speeches and writings. Thus, the book provides a detailed account of official, public discourses about the past.

Morina makes three arguments over six succinct chapters. First, she suggests that both West and East German leaders instrumentalized and distorted the past by blurring historical "truth" and ignoring the "complexity" of the eastern campaign, above all concerning the involvement of the Wehrmacht in genocide and mass murder. Second, she argues that the wartime biographies of some of her protagonists shaped their political memories. She develops this argument most clearly for Walter Ulbricht (an antifascist agitator in Moscow), Willy Brandt (a resistance fighter in Norway), and Helmut Schmidt (a Wehrmacht soldier on the eastern front). Third, Morina argues that the competing politics and ideologies of the Cold War shaped memories of the eastern front among politicians in the two Germanys. Pushing in new directions Jeffrey Herf's argument in Divided Memory: The Nazi Past in the Two Germanys (1997), she posits that different political memories emerged in the two Germanys. While West German politicians gradually came to recall the genocide of European Jews and ignored Nazi crimes against the Soviet Union, East German politicians commemorated Nazi barbarity against Soviet citizens and downplayed the specificity of Jewish victimization. As the two Germanys developed rivaling positions toward the Soviet Union, they found it politically expedient to either remember or forget Nazi violence against Stalin's Russia.

The heuristic of "divided memory" is employed most thoroughly in a fascinating chapter on the political mediation of the memories of former Wehrmacht soldiers. In the Federal Republic, former soldiers recalled their wartime experiences on the eastern front as a time of great suffering, victimization, and bravery against the Soviet Union. These memories reinforced postwar narratives of German victimization and reprised negative perceptions of the Bolshevik enemy. In the German Democratic Republic, former soldiers also effaced their involvement in genocide by stressing their suffering and hardship. But their rendering of the myth of the clean, honorable Wehrmacht legitimated East Germany's cathartic transformation into an antifascist country under the Soviet Union's leadership. Soldiers wrote about their antifascist transformation on the eastern front, claiming that defeat at Stalingrad showed them the barbarism of war and imbued them with passion to build a new Germany. In these accounts, the establishment of East Germany appeared as a progressive, desirable outcome of communism's victory over reactionary fascism. This memory occluded German responsibility for genocide and enabled "the collective redemption of the East German population" (p. 153).

Over the 1970s and 1980s, however, this divided memory started to loosen, as politicians such as Brandt, Schmidt, and Kohl began a "process of gradually opening public memory to the horrors of the Eastern Front" (p. 213). A similar shift also took place in East Germany among Socialist Unity Party politicians, church leaders, intellectuals, writers, and ordinary citizens, who now began to remember the genocide of European Jews. Yet, Morina does not discuss this change. Instead, her somewhat static discussion of East Germany during the 1970s and 1980s emphasizes Honecker's routinized commemoration of the war against the Soviet Union.

Morina has written a thorough political history of a little-studied topic. Her well-conceived comparison shows the impact Nazi violence had on the competing politics of divided Germany. Methodologically, her focus on political memory continues the longstanding interest among historians in highly public, official vectors of memory. She tends, however, to understand memory as something that is instrumentalized, leaving underexplored the deeper political, social, and cultural meanings of memory. Spanning nearly seventy years, her book will be of interest to historians of postwar German politics, the Cold War, and German-German relations.

MICHAEL MENG
Clemson University

INGA MARKOVITS. Justice in Lüritz: Experiencing Socialist Law in East Germany. Princeton: Princeton University Press. 2010. Pp. 244. $26.95.

In this absorbing, eloquently argued book, Inga Markovits takes us inside a vanished world. It is easy to forget today that less than twenty-five years ago the German Democratic Republic (GDR) appeared to be a historical perpetuity. Yet the East German regime disappeared virtually overnight in 1989 and with it an entire, perhaps not much lamented, way of life. For most people under any type of political regime, the courtroom is one of the places where they are most likely to directly encounter the power of the state. Even under state socialism, with its often totalizing claims on its citizens, the legal system offered some of the most direct experiences of state power in action. The author uses the court cases of ordinary East Germans to reconstruct both daily life under state socialism and the history of the GDR in action.

Markovits had access to a nearly complete collection of legal documentation from the small East German town of Lüritz, and she uses this material to recreate how Germans experienced East German law. Deftly navigating Germany's cumbersome privacy laws (which leave the book virtually without footnotes), Markovits reconstructs in fascinating detail the various domains in which East Germans entered the legal system. Chapters on property law (yes, there was such a thing), labor law, family law, and criminal law form the core of the book. Framing these chapters are considerations of personnel and personalities, that is, who the judges were and what motivated them, and the degree to which the Socialist Unity Party influenced East German law. She also describes the “amazing dishonesty of the East German legal system,” which was simultaneously utopian and paranoid (p. 182).

This is not a book that has a single argument running through it, but rather one that allows a series of insights to emerge organically from the “thick description” (Clifford Geertz) of everyday legal encounters in the GDR. This style works remarkably well because it mirrors the episodic nature of the legal proceedings it considers, but it does make it somewhat difficult to encapsulate the book’s arguments in short form.

Two themes might serve to give a feel for the rich texture of the book. First, Markovits traces the transformations in East German law across the forty-year history of the regime, from the early period of communist takeover, when amateurish true believers dominated the bench (so-called People’s Judges hastily trained in party schools), to a period of more professionalized consolidation in the 1960s and 1970s, when most judges were university educated, followed by a brief period of cynical fatalism as the regime drew to a close in the 1980s. This trajectory, from sincerity to competence to cynicism, shaped the different ways individual litigants were treated over time. For instance, in the realm of labor law, the early years tended to see workers and unions arrayed against (state-owned) enterprises in labor disputes. Beginning in the late 1950s, though, “union functionaries participating in labor litigation in the Lüritz court increasingly argue not for the employee whose interest are at stake, but against him” (p. 57). In the 1980s, workers with grievances were increasingly represented in court by lawyers rather than their unions, which led to a shift away from considering labor disputes in terms of interests, mainly those of the state and the work collective, and toward considerations of rights.

According to Markovits, “legal formality depoliticizes an issue. . . Their professionalism protected the jurists in the courtroom against the bombardment with social and political demands to which all servants of the Socialist state were otherwise exposed” (p. 58). This points to the second theme that emerges clearly in the book: the tension between legalism and political instrumentalism that characterized the application of law in the GDR. One might be tempted to dismiss law altogether in a state like East Germany, to view it merely as one more venue for the overt application of state power. Markovits shows that this is too simplistic. Throughout the history of the GDR, law retained at least a limited capacity to shield individuals from the state, as well as to expose them to its coercive demands. It is crucial, the author contends, to understand the “dual role” of judges in East Germany as “jurists and comrades” (p. 156). The system worked well when (but only when) judges were successful in both roles. The law was by no means apolitical in East Germany (if it ever is), but it did serve to formalize and regularize the otherwise capricious exercise of state power. In so doing, the law created a limited space for individuals to push back, sometimes with surprising success, against the demands of the state. Markovits’s surprising, illuminating, and often brilliant book thus offers a glimpse of a system often at odds with itself, trying (and largely failing) to reconcile the competing demands of legalism and utopian coercion.

DEVIN O. PENDAS
Boston College

YAACOB DWECK. The Scandal of Kabbalah: Leon Modena, Jewish Mysticism, Early Modern Venice. (Jews, Christians, and Muslims from the Ancient to the Modern World.) Princeton: Princeton University Press. 2011. Pp. 280. $35.00.

When, how, and why did Jewish modernity begin? These questions have occupied many Jewish historians, especially those interested in the Renaissance and early modern period when Jews, much like their Christian neighbors, struggled to come to terms with scientific discoveries, shifts from classical languages to the vernacular, new philosophical ideas, and the emergence of print culture. Many scholars of Judaism have been influenced by the thesis of Gershom Scholem, the renowned scholar of Jewish mysticism, that modernity was a rupture, an irreparable break with the past that is perhaps most evident in the mystical heresy of the messianic figure Shabbetai Tzevi in the middle of the seventeenth century. Shabbetai Tzevi and his followers developed a new redemptive paradigm and no longer viewed Jewish law as the fulfillment of divine will. He subsequently converted to Islam, and many of his disciples interpreted his conversion as a necessary component of his messianic vocation. Scholem viewed this episode as a critical moment not only in Jewish history, but also in European history more generally. While this last point is no longer taken seriously, his general view of history remains influential for many Jewish historians.

Yaacob Dweck challenges Scholem’s thesis in a novel way. He argues that Jewish modernity’s beginnings were much less traumatic, much more subtle and even arbitrary, and were not precipitated by a mystical heresy but by a failed movement against Kabbalah by the Venetian rabbi Leon Modena (Modena lived and wrote before the Sabbatian heresy). The refined and compelling story Dweck tells rests on the nexus of various components, all precipitated by Modena’s realization that the print revolution was being co-opted by advocates of Kabbalah who wanted to present Jewish mysticism as the default theology of Judaism. Modena was keenly aware of the dangers of print (e.g., the lack of control in regulating dissemination, editorial changes, censorship) and the relative safety of manuscripts, yet he also understood that he lived in an era in which print was becoming a norm. Modena also witnessed the rise of Christian kabbalism and the diminution of philosophy as the metaphysical template of both religions. He drew his battle lines using two medieval classics in Jewish theology: Moses Maimonides's Guide for the Perplexed and the mystical classic known as the Zohar. Modena surmised, correctly, that the winner of this theological battle would determine Jewish thinking in subsequent generations.

Dweck convincingly argues that Modena's attack against kabbalists and kabbalism was three-fold: Kabbalah erroneously transformed the Zohar into a legally authoritative text; it created a "cult of personality" around Isaac Luria, an influential sixteenth-century kabbalist; and Modena attacked Christian Kabbalah, which he believed was being fueled in part by the availability of Jewish kabbalistic texts in print form.

This book is a learned, well-written, and forcefully argued narrative about Modena in particular and Jewish modernity more generally. Dweck makes a strong case that the germ of Jewish modernity can be found in this polemical, controversial, and ultimately unsuccessful Venetian rabbi who fought against print in part by keeping Ari Nohem, his polemic against Kabbalah, in manuscript, by daring to challenge the sacredness of the Zohar and arguably its most influential interpreter, Isaac Luria, and by trying to make his readers aware of the dangers of print even as he knew it was the way of the future.

While this is a thorough and well-documented study, there are a few points that Dweck could have developed further. For example, at the same time Modena desacralized the Zohar and thus Kabbalah, he denigrated Christian Kabbalah, deeming it illegitimate. If the Zohar was not authoritative, why was Christian Kabbalah invalid? Did his attitude toward Christian Kabbalah stem from concerns about the adaptation of Jewish literature by non-Jews? Would he have said the same of Thomas Aquinas's commentary on Maimonides's Guide for the Perplexed? Or did he in fact view Kabbalah as a uniquely sacred dimension of Judaism? From another angle, Elijah Delmedigo, an earlier anti-kabbalist whom Modena greatly respected, aided the Christian kabbalist Pico della Mirandola by providing him with a bibliography of kabbalistic texts and at least one kabbalistic work. This not only shows Delmedigo's extensive knowledge of Kabbalah but also his role in the development of Christian Kabbalah. Did Modena know about this when he repeatedly and approvingly cited Delmedigo in Ari Nohem? Finally, Modena not only frequently quoted the Zohar in his sermons but also wrote liturgical poems for kabbalistic rituals.

This all suggests that Modena's relationship to Kabbalah is more complex than Ari Nohem lets on. This speaks to an important distinction between Kabbalah as metaphysics and Kabbalah as culture and part of Italy's "civil Jewish religion" in the seventeenth century. Kabbalah had become such an integral part of Jewish life by that time that it could not be separated from the daily lives of most Italian Jews. Given that, what was Modena really after? Perhaps Modena feared a kind of kabbalistic imperialism founded on the two pillars of the antiquity of the Zohar and the cult of personality of Isaac Luria. He did not want to eradicate Kabbalah. He wanted to control it. And here print culture plays a central role in his work, as Dweck astutely argues. Modena knew that print was already taking ideas away from their creators. The combination of kabbalistic imperialism and the emergence of the printed book was a "perfect storm" that Modena unsuccessfully tried to contain.

Finally, Dweck touches on but does not investigate a deep irony in terms of the reception of Ari Nohem. Modena's anti-kabbalism was a strident case for tradition, yet his work was not only rejected by most traditionalists in subsequent centuries but was most widely read and appreciated by reformers such as Abraham Geiger who struggled to rethink and often undermine tradition in the face of modernity. Dweck notes as much in his chapter "The Afterlife of Ari Nohem" but leaves it to the reader's imagination as to what this all might mean.

This is a strong and compelling book. Its revision of Scholem's thesis about Jewish modernity should be taken very seriously. Dweck has provided us with a complex work that requires readers to rethink the importance of Modena's experiment. The Scandal of Kabbalah reminds us that failures often contain the most evocative evidence for understanding the past.

SHAUL MAGID
Indiana University,
Bloomington

KATHERINE WENTWORTH RINNE. The Waters of Rome: Aqueducts, Fountains, and the Birth of the Baroque City. New Haven: Yale University Press. 2010. Pp. x, 262. $65.00.

This book is a groundbreaking study of the hydraulic infrastructure of Renaissance Rome that focuses on three papally sponsored aqueducts and their associated fountains. Taking an interdisciplinary approach, Katherine Wentworth Rinne deftly weaves art history, social history, and the history of technology into her detailed analysis of the role these structures played in the emergence of the early modern urban landscape.

By the sixteenth century only one of Rome's eleven classical aqueducts, the Aqua Virgo (Acqua Vergine), still functioned. The papally sponsored reconstruction of the Vergine (1560–1570) and the addition of two new aqueducts, the Acqua Felice (1585–1587) and Acqua Paola (1607–1612), provided the city with ample water supplies and contributed to a broader agenda of restoring Rome to its former imperial glory. Rinne sees this renovatio Romae as part of an overall strategy to restore the prestige and moral authority of the Roman Catholic Church in the face of challenges posed by the Reformation and the Ottoman Empire. More immediately, water became a tool of papal patronage, as charitable "gifts" of water were bestowed upon monasteries, hospitals, favored cardinals, noble families, and members of the papal Water Committee.

The micro-topography of Rome and the impact it exerted on the city's hydrology lies at the heart of Rinne's study. The Tiber overflowed its banks catastrophically and repeatedly in early modern centuries, flooding low-lying areas. Since the aqueducts were gravity-flow systems, topography was also crucial to the distribution of their water. Rinne convincingly demonstrates that the splendid new fountains, designed by architects such as Giacomo della Porta, were not simply interchangeable pieces of public sculpture that could be erected anywhere in the city. The elevation of the specific site in relation to its feeder aqueduct determined the water pressure, and hence the splendor—or feebleness—of the jets of water. This in turn influenced fountain design. Piazza Navona, for example, had a high elevation and low water pressure, so its fountains were large pools whose imposing breadth compensated for their lack of height.

In spite of the best efforts of the Water Committee and engineers, not all went as planned. The limited precision of early modern surveying equipment meant that actual water pressures did not always conform to initial expectations. When the pressure was less than anticipated, entire piazzas had to be lowered so that sufficient water would flow into the new fountains. The Acqua Paola solved the problem of low pressure by drawing its water from a higher elevation than the Vergine and Felice. As a result, it was able to convey water to hilltop villa gardens and feed spectacular fountain jets, but on occasion it discharged its water with such force that fountain basins were shattered and broken conduits caused landslides. While the main focus of the book is on the aqueducts and fountains, Rinne also addresses related infrastructure improvements such as drains and street paving. Thanks to this ambitious program of urban renewal, Baroque Rome would emerge as a city that was cleaner and healthier than its medieval predecessor.

In addition to her analysis of the technological and artistic aspects of the new Renaissance fountains, Rinne examines their social impact on Romans of all classes. For wealthy cardinals and noble families, proximity to a civic fountain or the construction of private fountains became manifestations of elite status. As much as eighty percent of the water supplied by the new aqueducts went to private users, but some did trickle down to the benefit of ordinary citizens. Some private sponsors built semi-public fountains as a way of bolstering their own prestige while displaying the virtue of civic munificence. Further down the social hierarchy, industrial users such as fullers obtained their own specialized basins. Poor washerwomen, accustomed to plying their trade among the rough company of the riverbank, were provided with specialized basins and even a huge enclosed laundry complex. Drinking fountains refreshed citizens and pilgrims alike, while horses too had their own watering troughs. Rome's Jews, however, remained at the margin both socially and hydraulically. In spite of its low-lying elevation, the ghetto did not benefit from the Acqua Vergine or Felice. The Jews did eventually receive a small allocation of Acqua Paola water, but not in proportion to their population.

The book's many maps and illustrations are beautiful, informative, and closely integrated with the text. They include depictions of the fountains (in modern photographs and early modern views of Rome), Renaissance technical drawings and modern analytical reconstructions, and a selection of early modern wall plaques recording hydraulic information such as flood crests, pipe levels, and fountain sponsors. Overall, The Waters of Rome is a fascinating study of the structural and social interrelationships that combined to create the early modern city's "intricate web of water connectivity" (p. 230).

ROBERTA J. MAGNUSSON
University of Oklahoma

ALLISON SCARDINO BELZER. Women and the Great War: Femininity under Fire in Italy. (Italian and Italian American Studies.) New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2010. Pp. x, 271. $80.00.

The approach of the one hundredth anniversary of the outbreak of World War I has stimulated scholarly and popular interest in its history. Many recent works have broadened knowledge of the war by shifting focus to other fronts, particularly those outside Western Europe, and by examining the experiences of average men and women who both willingly and unwillingly participated in the war. Allison Scardino Belzer's book is a significant contribution to this body of scholarship. A number of scholars have written about women's experiences in Italy during the war and its aftermath, but most of their work has not appeared in English. An exception is a chapter by Simonetta Ortaggi, "Italian Women during the Great War," which appeared in Gail Braybon's collection, Evidence, History and the Great War: Historians and the Impact of 1914–18 (2003). In Italian, important research by Barbara Curli and Stefania Bartolini has uncovered, respectively, the stories of women in the workforce during the war years, and the contributions of women to war welfare work as nurses and Italian Red Cross volunteers. Belzer is well grounded in this scholarship and steps confidently into the existing stream of literature on gender and women's history, building her narrative and expanding upon or challenging earlier interpretation and argument with varying success.

Belzer's book describes both women's lived experience during the war and the public discourse about femininity and gender behavior that accompanied that reality. The latter is the focus of parts one and three of the volume. In these sections she asks what changes the war brought in expectations of the ideal Italian woman. Like many other works, Belzer maintains that as men's absence forced women to represent and defend their families in the public sphere "for the first time, Italian society openly recognized that women were part of the nation" (p. 2). Female duty of sacrifice was "remodeled" (p. 35) to mean citizenship, and patriotism pulled women into volunteer work and charitable activity that was not new but recast as support for the war effort. What Belzer adds to the existing narrative are the voices of educated middle and upper-class women who asserted their views of women's civic responsibilities in writings and speeches.

A major contribution of the volume is the importance Belzer assigns to personal and prescriptive writings as the key to evaluating women's experience and essential to moving beyond "generic images" of women (pp. 10–11). Through careful reading of the multiple volumes of Scrittura di guerra compiled by Quinto Antonelli and others (1996), and exhaustive sifting through regional and national archives, Belzer has identified an impressive body of works by women that she uses throughout the volume. An appendix entitled "Notable Women Writers and Diarists" is a useful reader's aid as it identifies some forty women and their writings that appear in this work.

While Belzer makes numerous assertions about what did change in the ideals and the discourses surrounding femininity and gender during the war, many of her claims are not new and have appeared in the work of scholars such as Victoria de Grazia and Perry Willson. At times the arguments seem contradictory, and the evidence does not support them. What Belzer's arguments really demonstrate is the co-existence of continuity and change, and the impact of the war on the images and ideals of femininity in the 1920s, in what has been described by Giovanni De Luna as a "fracturing along multiple fault-lines" that involved a "plurality of models."

The most unique contributions of the book lie in the three chapters of part two, "Femininity in the War Zone," which uses women's own war stories to detail their lives at the front lines in northeastern Italy at Trento, which was "militarized rather than occupied," and Gorizia in Friuli, where territory shifted back and forth between Austrian and Italian troops until 1917 (p. 78). In some cases women were at the front because circumstances of class and timing trapped them there; in others women sought out the front lines and "chose to experience the war firsthand" (p. 85). The Italian government banned women at the front, but the military did not always enforce the order as they needed women's services, particularly as nurses but also as spies, guides, and couriers. Diaries of women caught in occupied areas provide evidence of fraternization with occupiers, and reports of crimes against women, but their authors "proved reluctant to philosophize about the war and their place in it" (p. 124). Belzer's book makes clear that women, like men, had "personal and patriotic motives" for being at the front and felt compelled to bear witness of their experiences in their writings (p. 10). Ultimately for both men and women in Italy as elsewhere, the lessons of war and the meanings given to the conflict helped shape an entire generation (p. 105).

JANE SLAUGHTER
University of New Mexico

PAWEŁ MACIEJKO. The Mixed Multitude: Jacob Frank and the Frankist Movement, 1755–1816. (Jewish Culture and Contexts.) Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 360. $65.00.

Jacob Frank (1726–1791), a mystical heresiarch, vagabond, and charlatan, is one of the best known and most researched figures of Jewish Eastern Europe in pre-modern times. His picturesque adventures, mysterious life, charismatic personality, and mystical and kabbalistic speculations have attracted countless scholars. The scholarly literature on Frank and the Frankists, followers of the mystical movement he established, is vast and still growing. But because of the attractiveness of Frank's personality and the aura of mystery surrounding his life, an aura that he worked hard to create, research on him is full of dubious speculation, baseless theories, and pure flights of imagination. This makes a new, rigorous investigation of Frank and the Frankists both much needed and most perilous.

Paweł Maciejko's book is a successful response to this challenge. It both critically reviews the state of knowledge on the subject and provides a careful rethinking of many of the basic assumptions on Frank and Frankism, opening new, fascinating vistas and making important corrections.

The work Maciejko invested in the book is impressive. Not only did he examine nearly all the existing literature on the subject, but he also managed to find numerous new documents, some of them of prime importance. Based on close reading of primary sources in Hebrew, Yiddish, Latin, German, French, Italian, and Polish and secondary literature in several other languages, Maciejko arrives at a much more nuanced and dynamic understanding of Frank and the Frankist movement than did his predecessors.

Maciejko argues against the dominant perception of Frankism as essentially a political project that, disguised as a religious movement, "served as a vehicle of emancipation" (p. 263). Instead, he powerfully demonstrates the originality and importance of the religious aspect of Frank's ideas and, to a lesser extent, of Frankism. His analysis of Frank's syncretic Mariological theories, which merged the Roman Catholic cult of the Virgin Mary in its specifically Polish form of the Black Madonna of Częstochowa (where Frank was incarcerated for twelve years) with Jewish kabbalistic concepts of Shekhinah (god's omnipresence; grammatically feminine), is especially revealing. At the same time Maciejko shows how the Frankists' ideas developed into a political program during the declining years of the movement after Frank's death in 1791. He therefore convincingly argues against the distorted, one-sided image of Frankism as nothing more than a political project. Instead, he presents Frankism as a dynamic phenomenon that changed over time in response to varying circumstances, suggesting that the most important ingredient in Frank's success was his flexibility, "the ability to adjust his teachings and actions to rapidly changing circumstances and needs and to the expectations of various and diverse audiences" (p. 264).

Another of the book's strengths is its broad contextualization of Frank and his movement. The book places Frank and his followers in the wider canvas of social and cultural developments of late eighteenth-century East Central Europe, both Jewish and Christian, showing and carefully distinguishing interactions, inspirations, structural similarities, and mere analogies among the various movements. Maciejko provides, for example, a colorful analysis of how charlatans such as Frank, Giacomo Casanova, and Josef Balsamo (Cagliostro) managed to function at the courts of Enlightened Europe. He also shows how Frank influenced and was influenced by others, where and when they met, and what the consequences of those specific encounters were. The author demonstrates equally good knowledge of Christian and Jewish contexts, which has not been the case with many studies in the field so far. Thanks to this, he arrives at several new and important discoveries, such as the existence of a surprising alliance of the Roman Catholic clergy and rabbinical elite in pushing the Frankists out of Judaism and into the arms of the Catholic Church.

The book's faults are rather minor. Though the study is very careful, Maciejko sometimes makes generalizations that are too sweeping. The most important example is a dichotomous division of the Jewish world into two antagonistic camps of Sabbatians and anti-Sabbatians, i.e., followers and adversaries of the heretical messiah Shabbetai Tzevi (1626–1676), that Maciejko at many places implies. Although he states that the early modern Jewish world clearly rejected such bipolar divisions, numerous figures are arbitrarily declared to be Sabbatian on the basis of the proximity of some ideas they expressed to those of Shabbetai Tzevi, but without strong evidence of their personal adherence. This is misleading, as it does not leave room for the structural similarity of separately developed ideas or for unintended influences when one accepts certain concepts without being aware of their origin. This was certainly the case for many supposed Sabbatians, who did not consider themselves as such, did not believe Shabbetai Tzevi was the messiah, were sincerely hostile toward many of his ideas and his followers, yet at the same time fancied some ideas developed in Sabbatianism.

At places, Maciejko's study is also uneven in challenging and accepting dominant opinions. While a new reading of many old assumptions is one of the most admirable strengths of the book, the author, quite characteristically for studies of sectarian, mystical, and splintering movements, too easily accepts questionable theses about the strength, extent, and influence of the subject under examination. This is the case when, for example, in his description of the scale of Sabbatian influence he relies heavily on the testimony of Jacob Emden, whom he characterized as unreliable a few pages earlier, or when he suggests, without providing evidence, that the Frankist movement existed as late as the 1880s.

These minor reservations notwithstanding, Maciejko's groundbreaking book not only will become standard reading on Frank and Frankism, but is undoubtedly an important study of eighteenth-century Jewish-Christian relations in East Central Europe. The Mixed Multitude features impressive archival research and analysis, provides excellent context for Frank and the Frankists, and is both instructive and an engaging read.

MARCIN WODZIŃSKI
University of Wrocław

BRIAN PORTER-SZÜCS. Faith and Fatherland: Catholicism, Modernity, and Poland. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. ix, 484. $55.00.

"It is permitted to take part in festivities and parties, but only those to which one could invite Christ," advised a Polish Catholic journal in 1929, clearly not relishing the carnival spirit of the roaring twenties (p. 66). Cited in this important new study by Brian Porter-Szücs, such a perspective on parties is suggestive of the argument that dominates roughly the first half of the book: namely, that Polish Catholicism, in spite of some very exceptional features, was also in many regards quite consistent with Catholic concerns across Europe and throughout the world. Working from a massive source base of religious journals, Sunday sermons, and episcopal pronouncements, the author shows very convincingly, in a series of carefully documented opening chapters, that the Polish Church followed fairly conventional Catholic lines—including some conventional divergence of opinion—concerning church hierarchy, human sinfulness (parties!), modernity and progress, and the dignity of the individual person.

While the Polish Romantics articulated highly heterodox ideas about the relation of Poland to Christianity, including the national theology of Poland as the Christ among nations, in fact most members of the nineteenth-century clergy and episcopate favored not only strict obedience to the church hierarchy but also civic obedience to the partitioning powers in Vienna, St. Petersburg, and Berlin. The reader becomes well-acquainted with many interesting and sometimes controversial Polish clergymen, including Zygmunt Feliński, the archbishop of Warsaw who could not support the insurrection of 1863 and ordered priests to stop singing patriotic hymns (p. 215).

In this study the crucial chronological turning points are not necessarily national occasions (like 1863) but rather important papal affirmations like Leo XIII's Rerum Novarum in 1891, Pius X's "Oath against Modernism" in 1910, Pius XI's Mit brennender Sorge in 1937, and John XXIII's Second Vatican Council in the early 1960s—that is, the same events and encyclicals that shaped Catholicism all over the world and not only in Poland. Because the chapters of the book are organized thematically rather than chronologically ("The Church," "Sin," "Modernity"), each chapter retraces the course of Polish history from the nineteenth-century partitioned lands to postcommunist, twenty-first-century Poland. Reading these chapters sometimes feels a little bit like Groundhog Day, the movie, when one wakes up in the morning and discovers that it is Rerum Novarum all over again. Yet the point is taken: Polish Catholicism cannot be viewed altogether exceptionally but may be best understood in relation to the general history of Roman Catholicism, and the church itself was often concerned with matters much more strictly religious—like sin and modernity—than the fate of the Polish nation.

The second half of the book, however, suggests that there did eventually take place, in the twentieth century, a quite distinctively Polish melding of religious and national values. While Romantic national messianism lay largely outside the boundaries of what was acceptable to the church in the nineteenth century, the concept of Polak-Katolik (actually the title of a journal founded in 1906) gradually insinuated itself within those shifting boundaries in the twentieth century. In a series of brilliantly argued chapters ("Politics," "The Nation Penitent," "Ecclesia Militans," "The Jew," "Polak-Katolik," and "Mary, Militant and Maternal") Porter-Szűcs draws upon his rich source materials to construct a powerfully persuasive picture of Roman Catholic thought domesticating itself in twentieth-century Poland, while very carefully negotiating the boundaries of orthodoxy.

Porter-Szűcs allows for the possibility of a gap between public church teachings and the popular Polish Catholic sensibility, with the latter perhaps precociously integrating religious and national elements (even in heterodox fashion), while the church itself lagged somewhat behind and tried to maintain its doctrinal principles. The book relies largely on church sources, so it is difficult to infer the elusive factor of popular heterodoxy within different circles of lay piety. Yet, much that we know about religious symbolism from the nineteenth-century insurrections to the twentieth-century resistance to communism suggests that Polish nationalism was, to some extent, free-spiritedly inventing its own Roman Catholicism to suit its own national agenda, dating back to the extravagant formulations of Romantic messianism. In describing the perspective of the church itself, this study focuses on a more limited spectrum of publicly acceptable Catholic perspectives at any given historical moment.

Roman Dmowski's National Democracy was initially, in the 1890s, unpalatable to the church because its brand of Polishness seemed not only secular but socially Darwinian in its competitive sense of ongoing national struggle for survival. Porter-Szűcs describes the gradual convergence over the course of a generation between Roman Catholicism and National Democracy, culminating in the admiring front-page obituary for Dmowski in the Catholic journal Przewodnik Katolicki in 1939: "It was he who first elevated the Jewish Question to the level of a political issue" (p. 328). One of the Roman Catholic scruples that separated the church from twentieth-century nationalism was the Christian injunction to love one's neighbor, and even one's enemy. Porter-Szűcs, whose important first book (published under the name Brian Porter) was titled When Nationalism Began to Hate: Imagining Modern Politics in Nineteenth-Century Poland (2000), has now, to some extent, written the sequel about when modern Catholicism began to hate.

This story was by no means exclusively Polish, and dated back at least as far as the stimulus to conspiratorial thinking in Leo XIII's encyclical Humanum Genus in 1884, denouncing the Satanic conspiracies of the Freemasons. Half a century later (and perhaps especially after independence and the Polish-Soviet War) the Polish church included many who believed that Satan was operating through Freemasons, Bolsheviks, and Jews, promiscuously intermingled. According to the Dmowski obituary in Przewodnik Katolicki, "the hidden forces, the Masons and the Jews, the sworn enemies of Dmowski, spared no effort to make Poland as weak, as incapable of life as possible. Dmowski declared war on them" (p. 328). Porter-Szűcs argues that it took some time for Polish Catholicism to become comfortable with such unloving and unlovely rhetoric, but by 1939 it was fully acceptable, though not uncontested, within the church. During the interwar years Catholic journals sometimes urged the removal of the Jews from Poland, though the writers did not specify just how that removal should occur. Such sentiments later made it difficult for some Catholic Poles to come to terms with the Nazi Holocaust, which actually brought about the desired disappearance.

The book's attention to the communist and postcommunist period is also extremely interesting and original, especially given the premise that the postwar Polish church was not simply turning to a venerably established tradition of guiding the nation. Faith and Fatherland includes a fascinating study of militant Polish Marianism, an almost heterodox view of the Virgin Mary as an active warrior, the Hetmanka. Likewise barely orthodox was Cardinal Stefan Wyszyński's "theology of the nation," which attributed a particular Christian redemption to a collective entity rather than to individuals. It is immensely rewarding to examine the theology and leadership of Pope John Paul II in the context of the whole tradition of modern Polish churchmen, and the book offers useful perspectives for considering the contemporary post-communist phenomenon of right-wing Radio Maryja within the changing boundaries of acceptable Catholic discourse in Poland. This impressive and insightful new book by Porter-Szűcs might also be read with interest alongside such important recent works as Roman Koropeckyj's literary biography of Adam Mickiewicz, which explores the religious dimensions of Polish Romantic messianism, and Geneviève Zubrzycki's sociological study of post-communist Catholicism and Polish nationalism, The Crosses of Auschwitz.

LARRY WOLFF
New York University

GREGOR THUM. Uprooted: How Breslau Became Wrocław during the Century of Expulsions. Translated by TOM LAMPERT et al. Princeton: Princeton University Press. 2011. Pp. xl, 508. Cloth $75.00, paper $35.00.

City monographs are a strange genre of history writing. They are nearly always labors of love, even more than are biographies, as one would be unlikely to devote years to and in a place one loathed. While there may be some social, cultural, or economic focus, a rigorous research design would surely require some comparison with other cities. Eschewing this, the historian stakes a great deal on the power of place. As a city's biography is fixed on the page, its author must convey the spirit of the book's subject to those who have not walked the same streets.

In the case of Wrocław (prior to 1945 the German city of Breslau), Gregor Thum and this reviewer share a deep fascination with his subject: caveat lector. But Uprooted should be of interest not only to our select club. This English translation follows German (2003) and Polish (2007) editions. The titles of those versions emphasized the city itself (Die fremde Stadt/Obce miasto). But for more distant readers, Thum has wisely chosen a title that highlights the people: those torn from their German homes in Breslau by the collapse of the German war effort, and those trying to make the pile of rubble that was left into a Polish Wrocław.

Breslau/Wrocław was hardly the only city destroyed by the war. But the significance of this case lies precisely in the question of a city's spirit, as suggested above. For in its first postwar decades Wrocław had no spirit, or none that could be admitted. What was German was rejected; the Polish version had shallow roots at best. Without a plausible genius loci guiding the story, Thum has a very difficult task before him: it is nearly as impossible to tell as the story that the first Polish settlers in 1945 tried to tell about their newly Polish home.

Uprooted is a study of that impossible story, and of how Breslau grew into Wrocław despite the ham-handed machinations of Polish communist leaders. The book is divided into three parts. The four chapters of part one document the takeover, settlement, and reconstruction of the city. Hundreds of thousands of Germans were expelled, and nearly as many Poles came to settle, or just to loot the ruins left behind. Meanwhile, mostly well-meaning Polish administrators tried to make sense of the alien streetscape, one that, even if whole sections had not been reduced to rubble and yawning facades, would still look unlike any Polish city. Thum evokes well the "pioneer" spirit of the first settlers and the helplessness of Wrocław's leaders as they tried to build institutions while fending off looters, Soviet soldiers, and their bosses in Warsaw. This social and political history has been told before, but no one has assembled its parts together as well as Thum, making this book an essential handbook for anyone trying to understand the topography of this great Central European city.

Part two, with six chapters, is the heart of the book. Thum considers the "impermanence syndrome" experienced by settlers who felt powerfully the effect of the dotted line with which West Germans (and even National Geographic) marked Poland's Western border for decades. Given these deep uncertainties, one can hardly be surprised at the eager adaptation of myths about Wrocław's Polish past, and the determination to erase German traces from every wall and every gravestone. It would be easy to mark this as the desperation of an illegitimate government and a deluded society; Thum instead situates it within the needs of a time and a place, and skillfully narrates the peculiar twists those myths took. For example, he notes that most of the Baroque churches (for which Breslau was renowned) were rebuilt after 1945 with Gothic interiors because the ornate decorations had been destroyed, but that in any case the Gothic was deemed to be more Polish and ideologically acceptable. As an older style, it evoked the time of Polish control of Lower Silesia. This combination of expediency and ideology, for Thum, marks the entire postwar history of memory in Central Europe, exemplified in Wrocław.

In the final chapter, Thum shows how a new, invigorated Wrocław has emerged in the postcommunist era, building new bridges to a reimagined multicultural past. Here too it would be easy to poke holes in the tourist-friendly pastiche. But Thum recognizes that Wrocław's choices, again, are both conscious and historically determined. A touch of the saccharine creeps in now and then, as he recounts the city's emergence as the emblem of Poland's confident, youthful, forward-looking image. At the same time, Uprooted offers gentle cautions against those who would celebrate too much the Wrocław that is, at the cost of the Breslau that was. Thum has written a compelling contribution to our understanding of the culture and politics of communist Poland.

PADRAIC KENNEY
Indiana University,
Bloomington

MALGORZATA FIDELIS. Women, Communism, and Industrialization in Postwar Poland. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2010. Pp. xiv, 280. $90.00.

What kind of general conclusion can be drawn about women and industrialization if a retired Polish miner, Józef R. from Katowice, tells a history graduate student in an interview that he cannot recall any women working in the mines during the industrialization of Poland under communism (p. 163)? This is the first question that should be asked when analyzing Malgorzata Fidelis's pioneering and long-awaited book on women, communism, and industrialization in Poland. How can we connect individual experiences and social processes in the complex transformation of Polish society brought about by industrialization? The book is based on a wide variety of sources such as the files of the women's section of the communist party and the trade unions. Fidelis also conducted nineteen interviews, recognizing the need for a different perspective on the past than that offered by party documents and newspapers. However, she considers these interviews to be "truth" rather than performances, and so we never find out how the various changing frames of collective memory influence the process of recalling past events, such as when Józef R. unexpectedly encountered a female miner in the darkness of the mine.

Nonetheless, this volume is a pioneering work operating at the intersection of two fields of inquiry. The first field is gender history, whereby women are regarded as a social group and the author aims to "restore agency to women" during this complex historical period (p. 4). The second field concerns the history of industrialization in communist Poland and how it was experienced by different groups of women. Some remarkable works have already been published on these topics, thanks to flourishing historical research outside Poland, but Fidelis's study is an outstanding attempt to connect the two fields of investigation to most Poles' hostility toward the leftist political project.

Scholarly interest in the communist-dominated countries of Central Europe has been informed by a framework established by sociologists and political scientists of the postcommunist transition who sought to identify winners and losers and to distinguish between those who had resisted and those who had complied with communism. Fidelis also works within this framework, pointing out that many women actually benefited from the Stalinist emancipation policy and should not be perceived purely as victims. The complex strategies of compliance and survival, sometimes narrated as upward mobility, are masterfully presented here.

The book consists of three well-selected case studies that cover three different historical experiences. It looks at three regions—Zyrardow, Zambrow, and Katowice—and two different industries, mining and textiles. Fidelis's analysis focuses on women's participation in these industries during the communist era. She also analyzes how the definition of women's work has changed over time. Interestingly, left-wing intellectuals in Poland—similar to their Hungarian, Czech, and Slovak counterparts—have tended to be more supportive of the traditional woman's role as nurturer than of the idea of expanding economic citizenship.

The inclusion of women into heavy industry fundamentally challenged gender relations, stirring resistance to attempts to modify patriarchal norms in Poland. From 1953 onward, women working in heavy industry were defined in the public discourse as "non-Polish." The same process happened in other Central European countries, where resistance to the Soviet type of emancipation and to communist efforts to transform these countries into producers of iron and steel led to strikes and ultimately to revolutions, as in Hungary.

With the state actively promoting women's employment, the terms double and triple burden were coined. As aptly described in the book, although paid employment granted women some agency, it also posed an additional psychological and emotional burden. Poland's communist transformation soon lost momentum, and there was a turn toward valuing women as mothers. As in other parts of Central Europe, women were driven from well-paid jobs in heavy industry both by economic necessity and as a result of new attempts by politics to regain control over women. This book reminds us of the consequences of using a national scope of analysis when analyzing a transnational phenomenon and of the difficulties of negotiating women's subject position amid the shifting frames of public memory. Fidelis gives a nuanced understanding of Poland's turn to the right in 1989 and the strength of anticommunist and pro-Catholic sentiments. In doing so, she explains why "gendered labor history" could not be written in Poland. So the fact that Józef R. mentioned that he could not recall women working in the mines should be the subject of study; maybe his forgetting was a form of resistance and agency.

ANDREA PETO

Central European University

PAULINA BREN. The Greengrocer and His TV: The Culture of Communism after the 1968 Prague Spring. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press. 2010. Pp. xiii, 250. Cloth $65.00, paper $24.95.

Paulina Bren's book is a groundbreaking cultural analysis of everyday life under communism in Czechoslovakia after 1968. It is a compact, cohesive, and entertaining account of domestic TV soap operas' role as mediator between a firm but concerned regime and an obedient but wary population. Based on communist party and TV archives, communist newspapers, and secondary literature, Bren's study offers a new narrative of "normalized" (post-1968) Czechoslovakia after Prague Spring's "socialism with a human face" was irreversibly crushed by the Warsaw Pact invasion. She challenges the political tale of dissent and repression that is commonplace in the historiography despite its evident discrepancy with everyday life in all its banality. She rejects the victimization complex prompted by the armed intervention and instead casts post-1968 history along new lines. Bren introduces ordinary people as fully legitimate social actors, redefines Czech politics as an interaction between regime elites and the people (TV viewers), and questions the very essence of socialist rule.

The book's strength lies in Bren's subtle reinterpretation of the absence of events, which she does by centering her reflection on the social compliance that characterized 1970s Czechoslovakia. She proceeds chronologically and thematically, but also empirically, beginning with an analysis of the intellectual context of Prague Spring (chapter one) and then turning to the political purge, at all levels, of those who did not approve of the Warsaw Pact invasion, a purge, however, that the government carried out with restraint in TV circles so that the party would maintain sufficient expertise to pursue its enterprise of seducing the viewing public (chapter two). The author then analyzes how the official interpretation of the 1968 events as a moment of “hysteria” took shape (chapter three), and how the new socialist citizenry based on a “quiet life” was constructed in its place (chapter four). Bren shows broadcasters’ concern to remain popular (chapter five), and details the case of Jaroslav Dietl and of his numerous soap operas (chapter six). Finally, she discusses the gender and family discourse the regime attempted to promote through TV serials (chapter seven), and the socialist “self-realization” model as an essential tenet of the socialist way of life (chapter eight).

One of the most original parts of the volume is the personal story of Dietl, a prolific soap opera writer who created a number of serials popular at home and abroad (including in West Germany) on topics such as a family during collectivization, a motherly saleswoman in a supermarket, and a hospital drama. As Bren aptly shows, Dietl embodies the ambivalence of the purge/collaboration dialectic, the dilemma of the “solitude of oblivion” versus the “humiliation of recantation” (p. 57). Eventually, like most, he remained in TV after 1968 and continued distilling a message of social and political appeasement in his TV shows. Bren further broadens the issue of collaboration by raising again the critiques of Václav Havel’s appeal for “living in truth” and by questioning his failure to mobilize his fellow citizens, who seemed more interested in the path of socialist “self-realization” offered by the regime. She points out, by quoting Milan Šimečka, another prominent dissident, that the most interesting aspect of this model (little work, little pay, but social security, time, consumerism, a guaranteed standard of living) is that this “subjective state” was entered “voluntarily” (p. 93). Bren thus shows that people created their own “normalization,” that they actively co-defined what “normality” was supposed to look like under socialism.

By studying the impact these TV serials exerted on popular opinion, the nostalgic feelings they still arouse today, and the postmodern focus on consumerism that was already straddling the East-West divide, Bren demonstrates that post-1968 communist regimes had the potential to appropriate for themselves, instrumentalize, and embody national culture, social norms and values, as well as social expectations concerning everyday life; that they did manage to create if not a new man, then a society that functioned “normally”; and, last but not least, that this could be achieved without resorting to excessive physical violence. But this point can be taken further: Bren also establishes troubling continuities between the Stalinist 1950s, the reformist 1960s, the normalized 1970s and 1980s, and the post-communist period, not only in TV and political personnel, not only in individual life stories of intellectuals and artists, but also in the long-lasting popularity of communist TV serials and communist artists.

MURIEL BLAIVE

Ludwig Boltzmann Institute for European History and Public Spheres, Vienna

GAIL KLIGMAN and KATHERINE VERDERY, Peasants under Siege: The Collectivization of Romanian Agriculture, 1949–1962. Princeton: Princeton University Press. 2011. Pp. xix, 508. Cloth $95.00, paper $39.50, e-book $39.50.

Peasants under Siege is an apt title for Gail Kligman and Katherine Verdery’s comprehensive and interdisciplinary study of the Romanian Communist Party’s (PCR) thirteen-year offensive against its rural constituents. Beginning in 1949 and continuing to its declared completion in 1962, the PCR, like the Soviet party it emulated, sought to bring peasants and their villages, land, livestock, and livelihoods under its control. Early efforts at persuasion and coercion by an uncertain and apprehensive party in the early 1950s yielded to a much more systematic and sustained campaign from 1958 to 1962.

In 1998 Kligman and Verdery assembled an international research group of twenty scholars—anthropologists, sociologists, and historians—to fan out across Romania and conduct fieldwork, oral interviews, and archival research. Constantin Iordachi and Dorin Dobrinicu have recently published an edited collection of case studies based on this research (Transforming Peasants, Property and Power: The Collectivization of Agriculture in Romania, 1949–1962 [2009]). That collection introduced scholars to the separate regional cases and previewed the themes that Kligman and Verdery tackle in Peasants under Siege: collectivization as a foundational act in the creation of the Romanian communist state and not an “auxiliary to industrialization and urbanization” (p. x), linking the change in property systems to the destruction of social relationships and “peasant notions of personhood” (p. 8), and challenging post-1989 narratives of peasant resistance and its effect on collectivization.

Kligman and Verdery are at their best when they turn their attention to the “pedagogies of power: technologies of rural transformation” (p. vi). Composed of three lengthy chapters that focus on the creation and deployment of organizations, cultural institutions, and techniques to transform the countryside and its inhabitants, as well as peasants’ responses to collectivization, this part of the book deploys the authors’ ethnographic prowess. They cull the oral interviews of their researchers, utilize their own fieldwork and findings, and pull from heretofore unused party and Romanian secret police archival sources. They uncover the myriad techniques, or “pedagogies,” utilized to persuade and coerce peasants into giving up their property and way of life. These included propaganda, contests, and mimesis. Party officials showed peasants exemplary model farms and the consequences of not joining: public humiliation, arrest, deportation, and denunciation. Despite these techniques, peasants remained skeptical of the collectivization project and engaged in “counterpedagogies” to undermine the efforts of peasant cadres, party officials, and socialist youth. This meant not only spreading rumors about life in the collectives, and the imminent demise of communism, especially around the time of the Hungarian uprising in 1956, but also disseminating anti-regime slogans and composing and circulating folk poetry that mocked and discredited collectivization efforts.

When the second wave of collectivization began in 1957, the PCR had learned from its encounters with the peasants and utilized this knowledge to complete what it had started. The transformation of the countryside was not carried out by an impersonal state or a monolithic communist party but rather by poorly educated and trained party and Securitate (secret police) cadres. The counterpedagogies that cadres and the secret police encountered affirmed their perception of “enemies” in the villages and led to a sustained effort to undermine traditional village hierarchies, social relationships, and identities and to foment class war. What emerges from this discussion is that the cadres were simply overwhelmed with their task, received little guidance or support from the center, and replaced persuasion with coercion and intimidation. Kligman and Verdery richly describe how party cadres and the secret police neutralized the “rich peasants” (chiabur) by striking at their economic prowess and their status, honor, and familial relationships. Both collectivization drives had the effect of remaking rural social relationships and institutions, “overturning status hierarchies and the emergence of new ones, and the infusion of everyday life with politics” (p. 425).

The authors are at their best when discussing the complex web of cultural and social relationships and practices. While the politics of collectivization has its own chapter, high politics is not always well integrated into observations about the actions and understandings of local actors and cadres. More attention to the connection between high politics and local actors would have allowed readers to see how party leaders absorbed the lessons learned by party cadres and secret police and modified their policies. This would especially help to explain why Romanian party leaders embarked upon the second collectivization drive when Polish and Hungarian communists were rethinking and modifying their stance toward the countryside at the same time.

The authors persuasively argue in their conclusion that the process of collectivization shaped the Romanian communist state, as a contradictory ensemble of institutions, projects, and practices rather than as an organized actor. Collectivization brought the state, through its cadres, close to the rhythms of village life, its forms of sociability, and peasant notions of personhood. This encounter with the village modified the communist project and the party-state.

MELISSA BOKOVY
University of New Mexico

EMILY GREBLE. Sarajevo, 1941–1945: Muslims, Christians, and Jews in Hitler's Europe. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press. 2011. Pp. xiv, 276. $35.00.

Across much of the postwar socialist world, from Yugoslavia to China, millions of now middle-aged people know something about the provincial city of Sarajevo. What they know they learned from a 1972 film, Valter Defends Sarajevo, about a communist partisan leader who coordinated the antifascist insurgency in the city during World War II. The film offers a picture of the city as stubbornly, heroically defiant, and ultimately victorious against the German occupiers. In her book, Emily Greble cites the film's most famous line, in which a German spy sent to hunt Valter down is about to leave the city, having failed in his mission. Walking with another German officer in the hills, he gestures toward the city below: “Do you see this city? Das ist Valter” (p. 150).

Valter Defends Sarajevo was part of postwar mythmaking about Sarajevo's, and indeed Yugoslavia's, wartime past. It is a beautiful story, the kind one wants to believe. Greble does not allow us to keep it, but she gives us another one instead, rooted in careful archival research and rich with characters and anecdotes. The wartime city in her fascinating book is more conservative, even reactionary, than progressive, and its inhabitants are more anxious than visionary about its future. Her actors—ranging from Ustasha officials, to local Catholic, Muslim, Jewish, and Orthodox religious, political, and cultural elites—struggle to navigate the constantly shifting landscape of alliances and power constellations that emerge and as rapidly disappear during the course of the war.

In chronological chapters, she first introduces us to the city as it was on the eve of the war and just after the German occupation and creation of the Independent State of Croatia (NDH) in April 1941. There followed the grueling winter of 1941–1942, characterized by extremely cold temperatures, widespread shortages, weak administrative coordination, the arbitrary and often inscrutable whims of the Ustasha regime, and an acute refugee crisis as ten thousand peasant refugees and orphaned children fled to the city from eastern Bosnia. With catastrophes mounting, a kind of turning point was reached whereat, Greble claims, many Sarajevans simply stopped taking the new regime seriously and sought to (re)establish and maintain control over their various communities using pre-existing—mostly religious—organizations and institutions.

After the Italian defection in early autumn 1943, the Germans sought to assert more control over the region and some Muslims, in an effort to create an alternative to the Ustasha regime, argued for the creation of a German protectorate. One byproduct of these negotiations was the creation of the largely Muslim Handžar SS Division, whose existence indicates that “there were at least four sides, perhaps more” in the civil war within the world war (p. 149). Greble's narrative then moves to the glut of atrocities and reprisals that characterized the last gasp of the NDH in Sarajevo, with arbitrary arrests, torture, and execution a daily reality. At that late stage, the Ustasha regime had begun to view their one-time allies in the NDH, the Muslims of Bosnia, as a fifth column, and therefore yet another viable target for persecution. Finally, we are offered a snapshot of Sarajevo during and just after the Partisans took control of the city in April 1945. Their organizational capacity stood in sharp contrast to the Ustasha regime's increasing ineptitude. Although the chaos and confusion that reigned in Sarajevo during that spring did not cease immediately, the Communist Party's Central Committee was active disinfecting schools, setting up "mandatory vegetarian days" to preserve livestock (p. 234), rounding up anyone and everyone for reconstruction projects, and prosecuting suspected war criminals.

Grebble's book is engagingly written and full of fascinating detail. Her argument that "town leaders were able to protect the values and ideals associated with multiculturalism while acquiescing to some political and ideological demands at the national and international levels" is more convincing for the first part of the book than for the end, where the atmosphere evoked by the sources she cites is more one of pervasive fear, insecurity, and desperate attempts on the part of the various elites to isolate and protect individual confessional communities, regardless of the cost to their neighbors (p. 28). Grebble also argues that one of the greatest casualties of the war was confessionalism itself, which took a hit under the Ustasha regime that turned out to be the beginning of a process of slow, state-driven unraveling that would continue throughout the postwar period. Although the Ustasas and communists "disagreed on which part [of Sarajevo's traditional legacy] should be sacrificed—confessionalism or pluralism," Grebble writes, "the two were one in Sarajevo, and negating either meant . . . challenging Sarajevo's intangible essence, its civic consciousness" (p. 239).

HOLLY CASE
Cornell University

KEVIN M. F. PLATT. Terror and Greatness: Ivan and Peter as Russian Myths. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 294. $45.00.

How did Ivan IV become terrible and Peter I great? Kevin M. F. Platt answers this question through an innovative look at their representations over time. He argues that the two represent an important category in Russian historical understanding: "the ruler who is alternately lionized for his heroic, great achievements and condemned for his extraordinary violence and despotism" (p. 2). In this work of cultural historiography, Platt examines the historical processes that contributed to the development of interpretations that emphasized Ivan's terribleness and Peter's greatness (and sometimes vice versa). He argues that evolving interpretations of Ivan and Peter reflect "a deeper mechanism whereby they have served as crucial sites in Russian articulations of the relationships between coercion and social progress and between trauma and collective identity" (p. 3). Interpretations of Ivan and Peter took many twists and turns, all reflecting the ongoing attempt to define what it meant to be Russian.

Platt begins his study with the Napoleonic invasion, at the time when Nikolai Karamzin helped to establish the modern Russian historiographical tradition. Before then, Ivan IV was mostly known as a severe but pious ruler, a view largely propagated through legends and folk tales. In volume nine of his History of the Russian State (1821), Karamzin described Ivan as truly terrible, a bloodthirsty despot who engaged in sadistic deeds. While he did not view Peter in a wholly positive light, other early nineteenth-century historians and writers during the period between 1812 and the Great Reforms of the 1860s did. Alexander Pushkin, in his famous poem The Bronze Horseman (1833), generated one of the first and clearest interpretations of Peter and his era as combining both terror and greatness. Pushkin's Peter stood at the center of the debate between Westernizers and Slavophiles that dominated Russia in the mid-nineteenth century. Westernizers saw Peter as "the superlative hero of modernization and social progress," while Slavophiles viewed him as "the champion of harmful alien ideals and . . . the greatest enemy of the ancient truths of both Orthodox Christianity and Old Russian national culture" (p. 66).

Many writers and historians at the end of the nineteenth century focused on the fact that both Ivan and Peter played roles in the deaths of their eldest sons (Ivan killed his son, Ivan Ivanovich, in a fit of rage; Peter may have participated in the torture that killed his son, Aleksei Petrovich). Platt's insightful chapter on this subject analyzes two paintings well known to any student of Russian culture: Nikolai Ge's 1871 Peter I Interrogates Tsarevich Aleksei Petrovich at Peterhof and Ilya Repin's 1885 Ivan the Terrible and His Son Ivan, 16 November 1581. Both provoked controversy and outrage. Many viewers saw Ge's work as supporting Peter's decision to arrest his son and have him interrogated for treason against the state; others took Aleksei's side. Repin's painting, a bloody rendition of the 1581 filicide, provoked a full-blown scandal because of its violent content. These canvases initiated yet another comparison of the two tsars and their eras. The images were in dialogue with one another and generated healthy debates about each tsar's greatness, the trauma they inflicted, and the legacies of their respective acts. By the turn of the twentieth century, Ivan and Peter had become so firmly established as the alpha and beta of understanding Russian history that, according to Platt, it is "difficult to imagine any unifying logic informing the range of representations of Russia's first tsar and first emperor" in tsardom's last decade (p. 130).

Early Soviet historians inherited these interpretations and initially did much to change them. While Mikhail Pokrovskii attacked Ivan and Peter as individuals in works published in the 1920s, he praised their eras as historically progressive. It was in the 1930s and 1940s that "a drawn-out negotiation among party elites, cultural managers, writers, historians, and Soviet society as a whole" took place in order to "master the Russian national past for the purposes of the present" (p. 193). The infamous Short Course in the History of the USSR, first published in 1937, reinvented Peter as the first Russian modernizer. It also presented a view of Ivan as the initiator of state consolidation, imperial expansion, modernization, and enlightenment, all policies that Peter continued. Although the Short Course did not entirely ignore Ivan's or Peter's violence, it did overwhelmingly present the two as great rulers. The culmination of this Stalin-era rehabilitation, as Platt notes, came in Sergei Eisenstein's uncompleted film trilogy Ivan the Terrible, which was significant because, in the author's innovative interpretation, the films brought "the affective foundations of greatness in the disavowal of terror" that had developed over a century to light (p. 233). Eisenstein grasped the myth of Ivan that had developed over time and made films that went "beyond historical allegory to offer an allegory of historical allegory" (p. 246).

This brilliant book is packed full of rich insights and important ideas. Platt's conclusion explains how Ivan and Peter continue to be important in post-Soviet culture. While historians such as Maureen Perrie and Nicholas V. Riasanovsky have written about Ivan's and Peter's individual impacts on Russian memory, Platt tackles them together in order to demonstrate how they have served as central symbols in the evolving construction of collective identity in Russia.

STEPHEN M. NORRIS
Miami University of Ohio

DAVID SCHIMMELPENNINCK VAN DER OYE. Russian Orientalism: Asia in the Russian Mind from Peter the Great to the Emigration. New Haven: Yale University Press. 2010. Pp. xi, 298. $40.00.

VERA TOLZ. Russia's Own Orient: The Politics of Identity and Oriental Studies in the Late Imperial and Early Soviet Periods. (Oxford Studies in Modern European History.) New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. 203. $99.00.

Even as studies of Russia's Asian expansion have proliferated over the last decade, the field remains in its conceptual infancy. Important empirical contributions, including these works by Vera Tolz and David Schimmelpenninck van der Oye, continue to fixate on Edward Said's Orientalism (1978) and its applicability to Russia. Tolz and Schimmelpenninck van der Oye highlight the importance of Russia's eastern periphery and Asia more broadly to imperial Russian culture and politics. Concepts of and relationships with the "East" emerged as critical measuring sticks for tsarist elites, uncertain of their place in a modern world. Both authors offer unabashedly sympathetic portrayals of scholars and writers characterized as "Orientalists," a term Tolz coined due to her belief that Said's work has unfairly tarred the term "Orientalist." Orientalists, for Tolz and Schimmelpenninck van der Oye, sought to elevate Asia's status in Russia's imagination and politics and uplift its peoples and cultures to a place of respect not only in St. Petersburg, but also across the Western world. Their efforts, the authors argue, were unique in imperial Europe and foreshadowed the national rights that eastern minorities enjoyed in the Soviet Union.

Schimmelpenninck van der Oye's work proceeds as a series of vignettes of eighteenth- and nineteenth-century authors, missionaries, linguists, and intellectuals whose careers were intimately bound with "Asia," stretching here from the Ottoman Empire to the Caucasus to China. Tolz focuses more specifically on the late nineteenth-century Faculty of Oriental Studies at St. Petersburg University. Both authors argue that this faculty's prestige symbolized Asia's importance to the tsarist state as well as the educated public; Schimmelpenninck van der Oye notes that of St. Petersburg University's fifty-eight full professors, nine were housed in Oriental Studies. Both highlight these and other Orientalists of non-Russian ethnicity. Viktor Romanovich Rozen, the faculty's dean, was a Baltic German; his disciples, many of whom were raised on the empire's periphery, had mixed backgrounds that included French and Scottish blood. Schimmelpenninck van der Oye notes the Turkic Caucasian background of Protestant convert Mirza Aleksandr Kasimovich Kazimbek, who led the study of eastern cultures and languages in mid-nineteenth-century Kazan.

This non-Russian presence is striking, though the authors highlight it primarily as proof in itself of the uniqueness of Russian Orientalism. Rozen, Kazimbek, and others ostensibly brought sensitive views of Asia to Russians. One Orthodox priest in Schimmelpenninck van der Oye's work spent years in China ministering to a small group of Cossacks who served the Qing dynasty and wrote prolifically on the country with "relative sympathy" (p. 150). Tolz's Orientalists not only studied languages and manuscripts but also brought Buddhist Buryats and other minority peoples of tsarist Asia to St. Petersburg as "research assistants" in a two-way learning process. Others, including N. Ia. Marr, worked with small Caucasus minorities to assert national rights. Tolz sees a "particular kind of political and cultural space where there was no boundary between the 'East' and the 'West'" (p. 5). Both highlight the fluid physical borders between Europe and Asia in the tsarist empire, where Russian and Tatar peoples coexisted in cities like Kazan.

Schimmelpenninck van der Oye's stories highlight Asia's importance to obscure scholars and leading politicians and authors alike. Catherine the Great's seven-month tour of Crimea, accompanied by Western dignitaries, presented Russia's newly conquered territory as evidence of its status as a European empire over exotic Asian peoples in what the author characterizes as a typical Orientalist endeavor. By the nineteenth century, however, Western and Russian views of the East diverged. Aleksandr Sergeyevich Pushkin, who followed in Lord Byron's footsteps with his portrayals of an exoticized east, increasingly viewed his "Asian" subjects, primarily Caucasus mountain peoples, as a symbiosis of European self and other and praised warrior honesty and bravery untainted by tsarist corruption and oppression. Pushkin, unlike Western authors, maintained a "deep respect for Asian civilization" (Schimmelpenninck van der Oye, p. 227).

Schimmelpenninck van der Oye's and Tolz's most effective arguments for Russian Orientology's uniqueness lies in the extent to which Asia became implicated in the relationship between the tsarist empire and the rest of Europe. To counteract national feelings of inferiority, Tolz's scholars strained to present Russian interaction with Asian peoples in a favorable light, contrasting with the cruelty of ostensibly more advanced Western states. Such a discourse presaged a late nineteenth-century movement to present Russia as a "unique symbiosis" of western and eastern peoples (Tolz, p. 58). Tolz argues that this language conditioned the actions of St. Petersburg's Orientologists, who became advocates for Asian minorities' political and cultural inclusion within the empire. Orientologists' guidance conditioned proto-nationalist movements across the empire. Schimmelpenninck van der Oye highlights a more complicated relationship after Russia's defeat by Japan in 1905, when Asia appeared to lurk everywhere for Silver Age authors and poets, primarily but not always as a threat. As Russia's place in the modern world grew ever less certain, the dangers of having mixed Europe and Asia became apparent. Andrei Bely facetiously credited continued cross-continental contact as having produced a "Mongol state" led by Romanov tsars (Schimmelpenninck van der Oye, p. 218). Alexander Blok saw contemporary Asia as a creeping threat to Russia's urban, European civilization but, as he steeped himself in Hindu and Buddhist thought, also as a path for an impotent regime and unstable country to reinvent itself. Other authors argued that Russians needed to awaken their Scythian blood, linking themselves to a fabled nomadic tribe who roamed the Eurasian steppe millennia ago.

Scholars of the Orient maintained a complicated relationship with the state, which supported their intellectual efforts but demanded "useful knowledge" to facilitate imperial rule. Implicitly drawing analogies to the post-9/11 era, Schimmelpenninck van der Oye and Tolz detail their protagonists' struggles to further their own scholarship independent of government priorities that focused on modern languages and imperial administration. Scholars nonetheless grew upset when their work was ignored by the state, and some moved between the two worlds. Nikolai Il'minskii went from the "anti-Islam" section of Kazan University to a chair in mathematics before assuming a position with the tsarist borderlands commission, where he formulated an educational system for steppe Kazakhs that would precipitate assimilation (Schimmelpenninck van der Oye, p. 137). The Society of Russian "Orientologists" (Orientalistov) declared itself "free from political goals" but readily participated in government expeditions (Tolz, p.

74). Tolz might have further pursued the complex relationship between tsarist state and society, but prefers to highlight scholars' positions as relatively autonomous actors seeking to destroy boundaries between East and West.

Both authors' engagement of Said draws them away from the nuances of their own work. In large part this is due to their characterization of Orientalism and subsequent postcolonial scholarship in their crudest forms. For Schimmelpenninck van der Oye, "Said's darker vision of Occidental contempt and fear of the Orient dominates thinking about the subject today" (p. 7). Both authors content themselves with arguing that their Orientologists' empathy and fascination with Asia at once renders them unique among Orientalists of their time and upsets the Saidian paradigm. Such arguments ignore Said's nuanced discussion of scholars of the East such as Gustave Flaubert in Orientalism. Neither systematically engages postcolonial scholarship. Tolz finds it sufficient to state that, "because the specific context of South Asia has so strongly shaped academic understanding of the issue, contemporary scholars have come to believe that, given the inherent inequality between colonizers and colonized, the two could not be genuine partners in the production of knowledge" (p. 132). Schimmelpenninck van der Oye represents eighteenth-century Moldavian Prince Dmitrie Cantemir's account of Constantinople's fall in 1453 and nineteenth-century artist Vasily Vasilyevich Vereshchagin's painting The Opium Eaters, among other works, as objective portrayals of the east, seemingly because they appear to the author not to condemn every aspect of Asian civilization.

To their credit, both authors offer counter-evidence to their views on Said and the uniqueness of Russian Orientology. Tolz notes that Vasily Vladimirovich Bartold, whom she lauds for his respect for Islam and collaboration with Central Asian Muslims for national recognition, "never wavered from the proclamation of the superiority of European epistemology over 'native' forms of knowledge" (p. 29). As he lauds Vereshchagin for seeing in the horror of war "no fundamental Saidian distinction between the European 'self' and Asian 'other'" (p. 91), Schimmelpenninck van der Oye quotes the artist's own view: "my main purpose was to describe the barbarism with which until now the entire way of life and order of Central Asia has been saturated" (p. 87). Even as Tolz seeks to correct Said through the Russian case, she proudly argues that the Palestinian scholar's ideas stemmed from critiques of Western imperialism and the arbitrary nature of boundaries between East and West that Rozen and others made decades earlier. Arab scholars, including Anwar Abdel-Malik, who inspired Said, absorbed Russian Orientalological thinking during their studies in Soviet Moscow.

It would nonetheless be a shame if the focus on Said obscures these works' overall value. Both make important cases for Asia as a central component of Russian culture, national identity, and political power. Russia's relationship with the "Orient" was complicated, to be sure, even if neither author effectively makes a comparative case that it was more complicated than any other European nation. Schimmelpenninck van der Oye nonetheless shows a strong command of the links between Western and Russian intellectual thought on Asia. I am unsure whether Russian historians' continued engagement with Orientalism demonstrates Said's continued intellectual power, the lack of breadth of our own field, or some combination of both.

JEFF SAHADEO
Carleton University

TRACY DENNISON. The Institutional Framework of Russian Serfdom. (Cambridge Studies in Economic History.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. xix, 254. $99.00.

The second serfdom of Eastern Europe was little burdened with the manorial traditions of the medieval West. On the Voshchazhnikovo estate in Yaroslavl' province, legal subjugation proved to be a flexible institution, responsive to the entrepreneurial energies of the serfs. Only ten percent lived solely from agriculture. Rather, they were millers, traders, smiths, cobblers, glaziers, apprentices, servants, day laborers, and even factory owners employing their fellow serfs. Some lived off the estate year-round, while others were on seasonal contracts. Many were landowners, renting both their own land and communal allotments to each other and to residents of other villages. These serfs took in servants and hired laborers from the estate. They lent money to each other and borrowed from local merchants and landlords. Remarkably, a few serfs even owned serfs.

But local and St. Petersburg estate managers proved no less resourceful in generating income for the Sheremetev family. In addition to quitrents, communal dues, and traditional levies, many of the serfs of Voshchazhnikovo paid an annual income tax and a progressive annual asset tax. In turn, given the virtual absence of state authority in rural Russia, the Sheremetevs provided an extralegal framework for enforcing contracts and property rights to underpin the economic activities of their serfs.

Generalizations about Russian serfdom abound, and thoughtful analyses revealing the subtlety and variability of these tiny servile communities are few. The greatest strengths of Tracy Dennison's fine study are its description of the role of tolerably efficient credit, land, and labor markets in the local and regional economy and its examination of the nature of lord and serf interactions and negotiations. Drawing upon the interpretive framework, but not the methodologies, of Philip T. Hoffman and Jan de Vries, Dennison admirably demonstrates that serfdom on Voshchazhnikovo was not embedded in an immobile agricultural economy. Markets made it possible for the serfs to develop different resource allocation and risk-management strategies than have been observed elsewhere in Russia. Communal land mechanisms were far less important.

Serfs here were not subsistence-oriented or unduly risk averse, and landlords did not seek to impose attitudes of self-sufficiency. Serfs allocated their labor and capital and used credit reasonably well, reflecting a rationality well-described by economic theory. Therefore, Dennison concludes that it was primarily the lack of a formal legal framework supporting entrepreneurial activity—and not anything inherent in the practices of serfdom itself—that inhibited investment and constrained economic development.

With case studies, scholars often struggle to place their findings in a larger context. In attempting to provide this context, Dennison takes on a polemical tone that readers may find disconcerting. She imagines that a "peasant myth" persists in all studies of the Russian peasantry from Aleksandr Ivanovich Herzen and August von Haxthausen through Alexander V. Chayanov and Alexander Gerschenkron to contemporary scholars. But first, the serfs of Voshchazhnikovo were not peasants, in spite of their legal status, as Dennison herself repeatedly notes. Thus, her critique of Chayanov's work on a peasant economy rings hollow, as Chayanov expressly limited his analysis to peasant family farms in agriculture, and he readily admitted the albeit limited role of markets. How else could so many serfs have paid cash dues roughly the value of three-days of labor per week? Second, Dennison is not sensitive to the difference between a rural economy and the practices of serfdom, ascribing too much significance to serf owners' policies. Her attempt to "explain as much as possible . . . without reference to culture or geography" was ill-advised (p. 17). Climate and geography, disease and demography weighed heavily on the rural economies of pre-emancipation Russia, best evidenced by the fact that state peasants, subject to little or no manorial authority, had similar social and demographic characteristics as serfs.

The author's discussion of the rural commune reinforces much that is known. Communal governance, the redistribution of land, and conscription were all sources of conflict. The church was weak, assistance to the poor limited, and village solidarity rarely evident. Her analysis of household structures and the family economy, however, is less successful, as it relies heavily on tax censuses. The 1815–1816 and 1856 censuses were conducted in order to take into consideration the demographic impact of the Napoleonic and Crimean wars. The tax censuses of 1833–1836 and 1850–1851 were preceded by cholera epidemics and crop failures. In fact, all six of her observations reflect a substantial underregistration of the population under the age of twenty, even beyond what might be expected from war and disease. Dennison does not apply standard methods to correct this undercount, thereby undermining many of her demographic findings and calling into question her conclusions that servile social structures were to a great extent a function of landlord policies.

This study is well researched and thought provoking. The four chapters on market forces are outstanding. Ignore the notion of a "peasant myth" and take conclusions that exaggerate the role of serf owners' practices with a grain of salt. The result convincingly demonstrates a remarkable flexibility in the institution of serfdom in pre-reform Russia.

STEVEN L. HOCH

Washington State University

SCOTT B. SMITH. Captives of Revolution: The Socialist Revolutionaries and the Bolshevik Dictatorship, 1918–1923. (Pitt Series in Russian and East European Studies.) Pittsburgh, Pa.: University of Pittsburgh Press. 2011. Pp. xix, 380. $45.00.

Scott B. Smith's monograph is a welcome addition to the literature on the Russian Civil War. Captives of Revolution is a study of the Socialist Revolutionary Party (SRs) from the start of the civil war in early 1918 through its tortured attempts to find a place for itself in both the Red and White camps, the party's eventual collapse in 1920, and its shadow life in emigration. Smith builds his account upon archival materials from five central Russian archives and two major foreign collections, as well as the party's voluminous press and memoir literature.

Russia's February Revolution of 1917 led to a staggering expansion of political life in a welter of local, regional, and national bodies. Throughout much of 1917, the SRs could claim to be, by far, the country's largest political party. (As Smith notes, however, party politics was far from the only forum for political life.) The party had a heroic past as an opponent of the autocracy, most notably for its string of attempted and successful assassinations of tsarist officials. The SRs were firmly committed to revolution, but only in a responsible and proper form. When elections to the Constituent Assembly were held in late 1917, the SRs polled the largest number of votes.

Yet as the country slid into civil war, the SRs proved utterly incapable of translating what seemed to be its broad following throughout the country into concrete support for the party's policies, and specifically into popular opposition to the Bolshevik dictatorship. Smith examines how, following the October Revolution, the SR leadership sought to explain this failing, and to find a way forward that would remain true to the revolution while not acceding to the Bolshevik usurpation of it. He follows the party's debates over whether to side with the new Soviet regime or to resort to "direct action" against it (including both armed resistance and assassination of Bolshevik leaders). The first two chapters trace how the party sought to respond to the Bolshevik challenge and the debates over the legitimacy of using assassination. The SRs were a central player in the early military challenge to the Bolshevik state. When in mid-1918 the Czechoslovak Legion drove out local Soviet power in the Volga region, the SRs entered the vacuum and organized an anti-Soviet government championing the re-establishment of the Constituent Assembly. The book's next two chapters trace how this government, first in the Volga and then in Siberia, fell under the control of military counterrevolution. The book concludes with the party's destruction and the Soviet state's show trial of its leaders in 1922. The author argues that the specter of the "renegades of socialism," and the SRs in particular, provided an enduring template for Bolshevik cosmology into the 1920s and 1930s. While the SRs were certainly an important figure in the Bolshevik worldview, Smith perhaps overreaches here.

The chronology of Smith's book dictates a tale of defeat and disappointment. He notes in the introduction that the party confronted two major weaknesses on the eve of the civil war (pp. xvi-xix). The first was the longstanding fractious nature of the party itself. While all SRs were committed to socialism and revolution, the party had longstanding fissures between radicals and more moderates over how to achieve these ultimate goals. Indeed, when Smith's narrative opens, the SRs splintered, with the more radical wing forming an independent "Left Socialist Revolutionary Party" and taking many of the rank and file with it. The second major problem the party faced was its own conviction that electoral support indicated strong political commitment to the party's policy among its followers. In this, it was very wrong. The party's support in 1917 had been very broad, but it had not been very deep. Smith finds, in addition, that the party's field of action became severely constrained by the Bolsheviks' success in framing the political field in binary terms, as one of revolution and counterrevolution. Therefore to oppose the Bolsheviks was to appear to side with counterrevolution.

All of this is very true. And it is a major achievement to cover the party's tortured passage through the twists and turns of the civil war. Nevertheless, readers will regret that the narrative begins so abruptly in early 1918, with little discussion of how the events of 1917 shaped Russians' views of the SRs and, equally, how the party's stupendous expansion shaped the party leadership's own views of its role. Equally, readers will miss a discussion of the elections to the Constituent Assembly and the SRs split with the Left SR Party, all of which occurred prior to the start of Smith's narrative.

The book's focus is very much the party leadership, rather than the dynamics of local party life. But this story is an important one. In tracing it, Smith untangles several key questions, such as the SR Central Committee's connection to the attempted assassination of Lenin in summer 1918, an event that provided a pretext for the Soviet Red Terror. The author is to be commended for his sober and clear-eyed analysis of the SRs, warts and all. It is easy to sympathize with this party in its struggle with the Bolshevik dictatorship. Yet he also shows that the party leadership was suicidally unable to unite around a common set of tactics and goals. While the party leaders may have wished to believe that it was Bolshevik repression that prevented more public support for the party in early 1920, Smith finds instead that by this time the party's agenda simply did not find much traction among ordinary Russians. At the end of the day, the party leadership's cosmology "proved better suited to the familiar confines of prison and distant shores of exile than it did to everyday politics in the new Soviet world" (p. 237): the SRs were more successful as persecuted oppositionists than as revolutionary actors.

Captives of Revolution provides a fair and valuable account of the SRs, a crucial player in the Russian Civil War. It goes a long way to explaining the party's inability to capitalize on what appeared to be a promising amount of political support in the Russian Revolution. The book assumes some degree of familiarity with the events and figures of the Russian Revolution and civil war, and therefore will be most valued by historians of Russia and the Soviet Union.

PETER HOLQUIST
University of Pennsylvania

IRINA PAPERNO. Stories of the Soviet Experience: Memoirs, Diaries, Dreams. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press. 2009. Pp. xv, 285. Cloth $55.00, paper $22.95.

Vladimir Putin once famously described the end of the Soviet Union as the greatest geopolitical catastrophe of the twentieth century. But it is rather the catastrophic quality of the Soviet experience itself that informs many of the hundred some diaries, memoirs, and life stories under consideration in this volume, which follows a number of historical works that draw on the crush of personal documents rushed into publication in the late perestroika period and the dozen or so years after. Irina Paperno, a distinguished literary scholar, brings to the enterprise the skill of close textual reading and also a sometimes untrammelled imagination that in places takes her beyond her sources. The result is a dappled compilation of deconstructed documents that proffer glimpses of previously unseen Soviet realities. "Historical events are always occurring—if they are not visible, you have to find the invisible ones," wrote one of the diarists (p. 173). This is just what Paperno set out to do.

The welcome revelation of that which had been hidden provides an ironic reversal of the Stalinist "unmasking" of hidden traitors and enemies of the state. Paperno's ambitious—if not entirely coherent—tripartite volume starts with an overview of her documents in the aggregate and ends with a daring, extravagant, and not altogether successful attempt at offering up dreams as a source base for the writing of history. The middle, and by far the strongest (and longest) section of the book, proffers an authoritative and imaginative reading of two apposite and wildly divergent texts: the editor and literary critic Lidiia Chukovskaia's Notes About Anna Akhmatova (1976), and an autobiographical narrative by Evgeniia Kiseleva, an ordinary peasant woman, sent to a film studio in 1976 with the request that that her life story be made into a movie.

No single argument could possibly run through this multiplex volume, which demonstrates on every page the impossibility of any single argument for just about anything. But Paperno illuminates much more. We see the utter pervasiveness of the state in people's lives in ways likely inconceivable to the Western reader. Many might know about how Akhmatova, together with many other members of the intelligentsia in the late 1930s, lived in fear of arrest. But more than anything else, what comes out in the two long texts by the poet's chronicler and by the peasant is the constricting impact of the state's role in the allocation of housing. A permit was needed to register a residence in a particular city and only the government issued apartments and rooms to its subjects. Akhmatova, poor and incapable of taking care of herself, lived in a shambolic apartment with her then husband, Nikolai Punin, along with his ex-wife and their daughter, as well as a family of former servants whose inclusion had transformed the residence into a tension-riddled communal apartment. When she left Punin she could do so only by exchanging the room she shared with him for the single space formerly inhabited by the ex-wife, who now moved in with him. Many divorced couples, unable to procure alternative living arrangements, continued to live this way for years. So when we contemplate "private," as opposed to public life in the Soviet Union, what do we mean? What manner of private life could such a home actually provide? That the word "privacy" has no proper equivalent in the Russian language only adds to the confusion.

The peasant Kiseleva, too, found herself forced to sleep in the same room with her husband and his "other wife," one of two mistresses he had taken at the end of World War II, when he refused to return to his real spouse and the mother of his son. Writing in simple descriptive prose riddled with mistakes in spelling and grammar, Kiseleva, a victim of great poverty and her second husband's alcoholism and debauchery, observed philosophically, "who don't drink nowadays it's the vodka century" (p. 128). She wove Biblical apocalyptic imagery into her prose together with phrases learned from the television that served as her only comfort. She found reassurance in seeing Leonid Brezhnev, whom she wished would be immortal; he was her protector from a future nuclear war threatened by President Jimmy Carter, who she considered "another accursed Hitler" (p. 141). Such thoughts reminded her of the trauma of the past war in her village, where "the wounded call out save us the last judgment" (p. 142). By 1991, when excerpts of Kiseleva's memoir were finally published, the "end time" had indeed come, for the second time in less than a century.

NINA TUMARKIN
Wellesley College

WILLIAM JAY RISCH. The Ukrainian West: Culture and the Fate of Empire in Soviet Lviv. (Harvard Historical Studies, number 173.) Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 360. $49.95.

William Jay Risch has written a well-documented book about a hitherto little-researched aspect of the integration of western Ukraine into Soviet Ukraine after World War II. As Risch points out, western Ukrainians never believed the Soviet system could be improved and they were alienated by the 1933 Holodomor (terror-famine) and the Great Terror that Joseph Stalin inflicted on Soviet Ukraine. Dissidents and opponents of the regime who emerged in Lviv were therefore more radical than their counterparts in central and eastern Ukraine. Of the 749 known dissidents in Soviet Ukraine between 1969 and 1972, twenty-five percent were from Lviv, only thirteen percent less than Kiev, and Lviv was second to Kiev in the number of arrests by the KGB.

In the decades leading up to Ukrainian independence, young people in Lviv were anti-Soviet and supporters of Ukrainian independence, and the city's nationalist and anti-Soviet ferment laid the basis for western Ukraine's mobilization of central Ukrainians in the late 1980s toward the August 1991 declaration of independence (eastern Ukrainians remained passive at the time). Risch argues that Lviv represented a "fault line of rival projects of nation building and imperial dominance" and therefore played a crucial role in the fate of Soviet Ukraine (p. 1).

Like in Kiev, Lviv's Communist Youth League (Komsomol) became a major force demanding political liberalization and Ukrainianization (pp. 183–184). New dissident youth clubs established under the aegis of the Komsomol in Kiev inevitably spread to Lviv. In the late 1980s the Komsomol in Lviv established Tovarystvo Lev (The Lion Society), a cultural and educational NGO, and became the radical wing of the Democratic Platform in the Communist Party of Ukraine.

Risch shows that the nationalist insurgency in western Ukraine was far larger, more vicious, and longer-lasting than anti-Soviet insurgencies in the Baltic states. Between 1944 and 1946 110,825 nationalist partisans were killed and the insurgency lasted another five years, in isolated cases until 1960. Another quarter of a million western Ukrainians accused of being nationalists were arrested and deported to Siberia. Forty-one thousand former nationalist guerrillas returned to live in western Ukraine by 1956, and they provided an example, encouragement, and members for various nationalist and dissident groups. Nationalists who had evaded death or arrest infiltrated Soviet institutions such as the Communist Party of Ukraine and Komsomol. Folk songs paid homage in private to the World War I Sich Riflemen, the post-World War I Galician Army, and Ukrainian Insurgent Army (UPA) nationalist partisans in the 1940s. When censorship was liberalized in the late 1980s, hitherto privately promoted homage went public.

Leading western Ukrainian writers such as Dmytro Pavlychko and Rostyslav Bratun flirted with Ukrainian nationalists in their youth, then went to work for the Soviet regime and in the late 1980s supported democratization and eventually Ukrainian independence. Prewar intellectuals encouraged an accommodation with the Soviet regime, but they identified themselves first and foremost as Ukrainians. Lviv's writers were always close to dissidents and oppositionists who published samvydav (samizdat). According to Risch, this meant that "establishment intellectuals thus agreed with dissidents' concerns about Ukrainians' identity. In return, dissidents came to incorporate the agendas of establishment intellectuals to justify more radical change" (p. 140). Pavlychko's poems, for example, were used to legitimize calls for independence. Many of Lviv's writers moved to Kiev and influenced institutions such as the Writers Union of Ukraine and Soviet nationality and cultural policies by increasing support for a Ukrainian sense of nationhood. The Ukrainianization of Kiev took place in the Soviet Union (in the tsarist empire Ukrainians were a minority in the city), and Lviv played a major role in this process. In the post-Soviet era, Kievans have voted with western Ukrainians in elections and aligned with western Ukrainians, most demonstrably in the 2004 Orange Revolution.

Lviv's intellectuals typified what Risch describes as accommodation, but not submission, to the Soviet system by western Ukrainians, writing attacks against Ukrainian nationalist groups while also condemning Soviet nationality policies and russification. In this sense western Ukrainians were similar to eastern Europeans in that communism never sank deep roots. Lviv never became completely Soviet, and the city's inhabitants viewed Soviet rule as imported, alien, Russian, and colonial.

Following the Soviet Union's annexation of western Ukraine, the region underwent a transformation from Polish, Hungarian, and Romanian identities to Ukrainian. This aspect of Soviet nationality policy is largely ignored in western studies, which have traditionally focused on Soviet policies of denationalization and russification rather than nation-building. Soviet policy in Transcarpathia, for example, erased Rusyn identity, which had competed as an identity orientation in interwar Czechoslovakia, and decreed that the region was populated by Ukrainians.

The proportion of Poles in Lviv dramatically declined from two thirds of the population during World War II to only two percent a decade later, which Risch describes as the "unmaking of Polish Lwów" and the "making of Soviet Ukrainian Lviv" (p. 34). Polish names, monuments, and cemeteries made way for Ukrainian. Lviv's Jan Casimir University became Ivan Franko State University. Lviv's postwar radical de-polonization was supported by Galicians, whose national identity had grown in violent opposition to Polish nationalism since the nineteenth century.

An additional reason Lviv became more Ukrainian was that far fewer Russians moved to the city compared to the three Baltic states, and Lviv was the least ethnic Russian city in the European part of the Soviet Union. The proportion of Ukrainians grew from a quarter in World War II to seventy-nine percent of Lviv's population by the 1989 census. Ninety-seven percent declared Ukrainian to be their native language.

Risch provides a good analysis and discussion of the links between Lviv and Ukrainians living in Slovakia and especially Poland. Until the Prague Spring in 1968, Ukrainians in Poland and Czechoslovakia could publish far more freely than in the USSR. Ukrainian minorities in Eastern Europe therefore acted as intermediaries, transporting Ukrainian samvydav westward and Ukrainian émigré publications eastward.

The author does not, however, adequately describe the interaction of Ukrainian émigré organizations in Western Europe and North America, most of whose members were from western Ukraine and were virulently anticommunist, with Soviet Ukraine. Risch discusses in a brief and unsatisfactory manner émigré groups such as OUN (Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists) without discussing different strategies adopted by its three wings, the distribution of émigré publications in Soviet Ukraine, KGB infiltration of underground OUN networks, and the collaboration of one OUN group with the CIA from the mid-1940s through 1991. The author also does not adequately cover the influence of the Polish émigré magazine Kultura upon Ukrainian-Polish reconciliation, the impact of the election of a Polish pope on the underground Ukrainian Catholic Church, and cooperation by Ukrainian émigrés and dissidents, especially in the second half of the 1980s, with the Polish Solidarity movement and other Polish anticommunist groups.

TARAS KUZIO
Hokkaido University

MIDDLE EAST AND NORTHERN AFRICA

PHILIP WOOD. 'We have no King but Christ': Christian Political Thought in Greater Syria on the Eve of the Arab Conquest (c.400–585). (Oxford Studies in Byzantium.) New York: Oxford University Press. 2010. Pp. ix, 295. $110.00.

Are national identities exclusively modern? This question is hotly debated among political scientists and historians of modernity. Philip Wood brings this debate to a premodern setting: the eastern Roman and western Persian empires in the fifth and sixth centuries. Here, as Wood reads political and religious discourse, he finds versions of Syrian identity based on shared language, religion, myths of origin, and territoriality. While he posits no mass participation or ancient nationalism, he sees regional identities with political implications.

Wood situates his work amid debates about nationalism, Roman imperial discourse, and provincial ethnic communities. Roman-era regional identities have long drawn interest from historians. Early twentieth-century scholars saw regional languages as marking nations. Divergent theologies seemed to harbor separatism—especially devotion to a “one-nature” (miaphysite) Christ. After 1950, these essentialist views were demolished; since then many scholars have minimized regional identity. Fergus Millar stressed elite Greek cultural dominance. Averil Cameron cast Christian imperial rhetoric as totalizing. Others have dissented. Garth Fowden saw regional identities emerging from monotheistic faith. Now Wood joins a recent trend by finding new social meanings in Syriac literature.

This book's first four chapters discuss the fifth-century creation of Syrian cultural identity. Chapter one surveys Greek ecclesiastical historians' expressions of orthodox imperial ideology. Imperial elites had once seen Greek learning as encouraging self-control, guiding emperors and improving barbarians. Later, the self-controlled emperor's support for orthodoxy was cast as taming heretics and barbarians (pp. 28–32). But this ideology faced problems in Syria, with its distinct Christian practices. Chapter two explores how Theodoret (in his Historia religiosa) dealt with ascetics who represented Syrian cultural distinction. According to Wood, Theodoret ignored “heteropract” ascetics and erased others' troubling activities, while still casting their “barbarian” wisdom as holy (pp. 56–66).

Chapter three summarizes research on Roman-era ethnic identity. Supporting Millar's view of Greek predominance, Wood focuses on exceptions—Jews and Samaritans—who sustained distinct identities (pp. 71–75). Then he turns to Syrian Edessa and shows how its “Syriac” dialect spread and gained prestige due to Christian missionizing. The result was not separatism, but cultural independence (pp. 75–81). Chapter four scrutinizes fifth-century Syriac literature for evidence of Syrian identity. Wood starts with the Doctrina Addai, which revised the legend of first-century King Abgar hosting Addai the Apostle. Wood sees a linguistic, Christian, Edessan pride, here and in other texts (pp. 94–95, 98–99). Next, Wood considers anti-Jewish additions to the Doctrina Addai, which, he claims, employed Edessan holiness to critique imperial policy (pp. 107–110). He also surveys Persian Christian legends (the Acts of Mar Mari and Cave of Treasures), which broadened Edessan identity to support various doctrines and reify a faithful Syrian race (pp. 116–117, 121–124).

The final chapters explore sixth-century redeployments of Syrian identity. Chapter five locates Edessan pride in the Julian Romance through its retelling of the “apostate” emperor's reign. Here an uncontrolled Julian meets resistance in faithfully Christian Edessa, while Jews, and nearby pagans, appear as unconvertible enemies. Wood sees Edessan identity used to sharpen confessional boundaries (pp. 148–149). He also discerns criticism of Emperor Justinian for ousting Edessa's miaphysite bishop (pp. 159–162). Chapter six probes the use of Syrian identity in sixth-century doctrinal conflicts. As emperors supported a “two-nature” (dyophysite) Christ, miaphysite Syriac writers (especially John of Ephesus) touted their region's special holiness, which trumped the unreliable emperors' authority (pp. 186–198). Chapter seven looks to Ethiopia and Yemen, regions visited by miaphysite missionaries, and to their texts (the Book of the Himyarites and Kebrā Nagast), which celebrated sanctity in Syria and locally. Wood claims that writers reused Syrian political discourse to build a commonwealth of miaphysite identities. As identity formation reached northern Arabs, Wood perceives a precedent for Islam (pp. 254–256). Wood concludes by comparing fifth-century resurgent Jewish identity with these other nascent ethnie. In each case, language, religion, myths of origin, and territoriality enabled marginal groups to limit imperial power.

Wood's argument is valuably provocative. His contribution is not just new textual readings, but a framework whereby texts reveal ethnic political identity. Wood's discussion of fifth-century Greek writers assumes that they represent imperial ideology, sometimes overlooking their idiosyncratic concerns. But his work with Syriac writers is compelling, as he finds fragments of resistant identity within the discourse of empire. Wood launches welcome debate by borrowing from social scientists (especially Anthony Smith). His work, though, begs a question: what social forces supported ancient ethnic identities, in circumstances different from nineteenth-century Europe? We might consider the impact of hagiography, congregational preaching, ascetic and educational centers, patronage networks, or jurisdictional boundaries. Wood does fine work surveying textual discourse; further steps may require different approaches.

ADAM M. SCHOR
University of South Carolina

TAYEB EL-HIBRI. Parable and Politics in Early Islamic History: The Rashidun Caliphs. New York: Columbia University Press, 2010. Pp. xi, 471. $60.00.

Tayeb El-Hibri invites us to read the medieval chronicles of the early, formative period of the Islamic community in the same way we approach the plays of William Shakespeare. When we read the ninth-century annals of al-Tabari, we may find a framework of events grounded in the actual events and persons of the first decades of the Islamic community: the Rightly Guided caliphs, the Arab conquests, the first civil war between the supporters of 'Alī and his opponents. But, like Shakespeare in Julius Caesar, Tabari ascribes motives, argumentations, and portrayals of character that are intended as parables about political power and morality, about the different approaches to solving the tensions between religious and moral ideals and realpolitik.

Reading Tabari this way makes sense; in fact, it seems the intuitive way of approaching Tabari and other Abbasid historians. The authors cared less about accurate chronology and more about communicating allusive meanings and dramatic storylines. The long speeches ascribed to the caliphs could not be verbatim quotations but are construed to convey a complex set of meanings about the speaker, or to allude to connections with biblical or qur'anic rulers and themes. Similarly, the details of the ominous meetings of characters who will later confront each other, and of course the frequent prophesying, make this the "Islamic parabolic novel" (p. 237).

Trying to sift myth and facts in the Abbasid chronicles is futile. These works were not collections of earlier fragments but authored texts that should be read as a whole, for their dramatic impact. And, as with Shakespeare, the main characters are rarely one-dimensional. Although all the chroniclers discussed are Sunni, they communicate both points of view, empathizing with the sense of injustice expressed by the supporters of 'Alī. Even in the key dramatic event, the assassination of 'Uthmān that would lead to civil war, the involvement of 'Alī remains an enigma, an unsolved mystery.

Each of the caliphs and each of the characters gets a chapter in El-Hibri's book. Abū Bakr, the first caliph, is a symbol of wisdom and religious piety, mirroring the qualities ascribed to the Prophet Muhammad; in a biblical framework, Abū Bakr is Moses's Aron (Hārūn). 'Umar, by contrast, is rough and practical; his character symbolizes the Arab element in Islam, and egalitarian cohesive ideals as opposed to the hierarchy of the Persianate Abbasid state. The third caliph, 'Uthmān, is a tragic figure, an aging, sometimes unjust and indecisive ruler who maintains the moral right to expect obedience. And finally 'Alī, the opposite of 'Umar, represents puritanism, philosophical wisdom, and a symbol of the Persian element in Abbasid society.

El-Hibri points out many biblical allusions, mostly referring to the experience of the Israelites who were led by Moses but then deserted him. The conduct of 'Uthmān before his assassination, telling his guards to leave the gate open so that the murderers could come in, evokes the image of Jesus allowing himself to be sacrificed. Many motifs are universal. The last Sasanian emperor Yazdajird dies at the hands of a simple miller; the mill serves as a motif of the turns in life. Beyond individual anecdotes, the overall parable is about the genesis of the Islamic community, like the biblical genesis of Adam, with civil war and a biblical fall caused by the temptations of power, greed, and excessive zeal.

El-Hibri replicates in this book the methodology he applied in his earlier monograph on al-Tabari's narration of the early Abbasid caliphate. Yet, the material here is more controversial, as it touches on the founding fathers of Islam. Thus, he can be faulted for not refining his methodology. There is no attempt to compare Abbasid chronicles to other narratives of the Rightly Guided caliphs, so it is impossible to know whether al-Tabari's generation had a distinct narrative, specific to the concerns of its Abbasid audience; El-Hibri tells us this is so and we have to take his word for it. Similarly, the reading of biblical allusions is a fascinating literary exercise, but there is no evidence that these allusions would have been picked up in medieval Baghdad. El-Hibri beautifully compares 'Umar's death at the mosque in Medina to Julius Caesar's at the steps of the Roman forum, with 'Alī the caliph's Brutus. This, of course, could not have been an allusion intended by the ninth-century authors, which El-Hibri does not imply. But one is left to wonder whether this book as a whole is just an appealing exercise in literary interpretation, one that tells us little about the Abbasids or their attitude to politics.

YOSSEF RAPOPORT
Queen Mary, University of London

NORMAN CALDER. Islamic Jurisprudence in the Classical Era. Edited by COLIN IMBER. Foreword and afterword

by ROBERT GLEAVE. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2010. Pp. vii, 233. $95.00.

This publication provides a welcome addition to the advanced literature of Islamic jurisprudence in English. The book contains an introduction and afterword by Robert Gleave and four chapters based on Norman Calder's findings from the project that he did not complete prior to his death in 1998.

In chapter one (The Hanafi Law on Fornication), Calder presents a preliminary assessment of the works of fiqh focusing on the difference between mukhtasar (epitomes of law) and mabsūṭ (expansums), together with the indication of how they developed through time. By using the law of fornication or zina as an example, Calder focuses on the techniques of legal presentation and reasoning displayed in the different texts. After discussing a hermeneutical tradition in section three and the problem of social reality in section four, Calder concludes by stating that "the contents of the law were always potentially a judgment of reality . . . But the fundamental trajectory of the literary tradition seems best expressed in terms of the type I have chosen" (p. 71). Unfortunately, we do not know why he chose such a type.

In chapter two, "Nawawī and the Typologies of Fiqh Writing," Calder focuses on Nawawī's commentary sharh of the Muhadhdhab by Shirazi (d. 476/1083). Calder chooses the distribution of alms (sadaqat) as an example in this work of mabsūṭ. Distinguishing and filling logical gaps, according to Calder, represents an important way that Nawawī developed (or changed) Shirazi's work. Calder argues that Nawawī demonstrates a very pure sense of the jurist's task. Chapter three, "Scholars, Muftis, Judges and Secular Power: The Need for Distinctions," highlights the meaning and the role of muftis. Here, Calder analyzes the work of Taqī al-Dīn al-Subkī (d. 756) and concludes by assessing various functionaries of Islamic jurisprudence. Chapter four focuses on the social functions of fatwas.

My main difficulty with Calder's work in general is also found in this volume. Such difficulty stems from his unclear and sometimes confusing translation of the Arabic texts provided. The following are examples of this taken from Calder's translation of Mawsili's text (pp. 24–26), followed by my comments and suggested translation in the brackets: 3.1 Confession means . . . [Zina is established by confession which means. . .]. 3.1 . . . to be out of vision . . . [to be out of vision of the qadi]. 4. A woman is not to be stripped save of padding and stuffing. This translation is not clear and could be misleading since the original word for padding is faru, which refers to all kinds of clothes made from animal skin. The word can lead to variation in the legal injunction deduced. 4.2 Stoning and beating are not combined for a muhsan, nor beating and banishment for a non muhsan unless the Iman considers the [banishment] a benefit. The object of this sentence is not [banishment] but the [combination of the two punishments]. 6.1 If a man has intercourse with the slave girl . . . of his thricedivorced wife during idda and says, I thought it was permitted, he is not subject to hadd. [I thought she was a permitted woman to have intercourse with, he is not subject to hadd.] 6.3 If a woman other than his wife is brought to him after a wedding ceremony, and he has intercourse with her, he is not subject to hadd. Here there is a mistranslation for the word zuffat that Mawsili used in his text (passive voice of zaffa), which designates the ceremonial procession of carrying the bride to her husband. It has to be realized that the non-validity of hadd here is due to the fact that the bridegroom could have been confused by the ceremony to think that he is entitled to have intercourse with the bride brought to him.

Still there remains little doubt that Calder understood almost all the complex texts that he was dealing with. His superior translation skills are reflected in a fine English text. Yet, sometimes he makes less sense to the reader who cannot understand his statements without referring to the Arabic text.

Gleave and Colin Imber should be recognized for skillfully salvaging an important posthumous work. I have to add that while reading the book I felt that it was an incomplete story that could still be understood, even without an ending.

MAWIL IZZIDIEN

Trinity Saint David University of Wales, Lampeter

WALTER E. KAEGI. Muslim Expansion and Byzantine Collapse in North Africa. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2010. Pp. xx, 345. $99.00.

Byzantine North Africa was one of the Roman Empire's wealthiest provinces, at least as far as the archaeological evidence informs us about connections between it and the eastern Mediterranean and Aegean regions up to the middle of the seventh century. Its importance as a resource for the beleaguered eastern Roman capital of Constantinople is attested to by the presence of high-ranking fiscal officials there from the middle of the seventh century until the final demise of Byzantine authority in the late 690s. But its history, especially from the period after the reconquest from the Vandals under Justinian, has remained in many respects a puzzle. Very little is known about Byzantine North Africa's Latin cultural life or the relations between its urbanized littoral and the hinterland. The greatest puzzle of all, however, concerns its conquest by Islam in the period from the mid-640s to the end of the seventh century: not so much because this is surprising, given the Islamic conquest of the greater Syrian region and Egypt, but in view of the drawn-out and piecemeal process of conquest, the fact that we know little about either the reaction of the indigenous populations to Islamic invasion, their response in terms of defensive actions, or the strategy followed by the local military is surprising. It is not clear what support or assistance, if any, was sent from other parts of the empire, even though the government at Constantinople placed considerable value on the provinces from an economic point of view. In twelve chapters Walter Kaegi's book sets out to analyze the background, process, and results of the Islamic conquest from the perspective of warfare. The book examines factors that played pivotal roles in the conquest: terrain, environment, logistics, manpower, military organization, and leadership, as well as local provincial attitudes. This is an important contribution, and while some historians might have preferred a volume more focused on the cultural and economic history of Byzantine North Africa, Kaegi does try to take these issues into account.

The book begins with a chapter on the challenges raised by the subject, discussing a series of methodological and context-setting issues before proceeding to a second chapter that deals with the sources and the literature, as well as the attendant politics of North African history writing in relation to Byzantium. Chapter three takes the landscape as its focus and deals with issues of settlement and demography as well as with social, cultural, ethnic, and linguistic frameworks. Chapter four examines the ways Christian North African society responded to the threat of conquest, the challenges of regional identity, and a distant government in Constantinople. Subsequent chapters explore the military's local organization, personnel, broader strategic interests, and defenses on the ground: the initial Byzantine defeat at Sufetula (Sbeitla), the immediate Byzantine and provincial North African response, as well as the Constantinopolitan and imperial perspectives, including the strategic advances made by Constant II in Italy and Sicily. More could probably have been made of aspects of the fiscal history, especially the role and significance of kommerkiarioi. The final chapters bring into the foreground Islamic perspectives and, in a series of important and valuable discussions, paint a more integrated picture of how the Byzantine, Islamic, and non-Roman indigenous populations interacted during this period. The author treats the fall of Carthage and describes how, in the aftermath, Islamic forces were able to push into southern Spain and into the western Mediterranean.

There are many points where one might disagree with, or at least wish to nuance, some of Kaegi's arguments, but this does not detract from his achievement in presenting a more balanced, persuasive, and integrated account of the Islamic conquest of North Africa than has appeared hitherto. This is an important and timely contribution, and it should stimulate further discussion and debate on a crucial aspect of seventh-century Byzantine, Islamic, and North African history.

JOHN HALDON
Princeton University

CHRISTINE M. PHILLIOU. Biography of an Empire: Governing Ottomans in an Age of Revolution. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 2011. Pp. xxx, 286. Cloth $60.00, paper $24.95.

This book attempts to analyze the turbulent changes that occurred in the Ottoman Empire in the late eighteenth and the first half of the nineteenth centuries through the biography of Stephanos Vogorides. Vogorides's life story is also used to demonstrate how a man of Bulgarian origin used his multiple ties to Phanariot households to climb up within the Ottoman administrative system, and how he survived the tumultuous years following the Greek revolt in 1821, and re-established himself as Prince of Samos thanks to his connections to the British embassy and the Ottoman court.

Although the book promises a fresh approach to the history of the period, the author fails to execute her idea effectively. Taking Vogorides's 1852 letter, an "apologia," according to Christine M. Philliou (pp. 1–4), to Stratford Canning, the British ambassador in Istanbul, as her starting point, Philliou proceeds to draw an anachronistic picture not only of Vogorides himself but also of the Ottoman Empire. Accepting at face value such schematic divisions as Muslim/non-Muslim (pp. 5–6) and formal, official/informal politics (p. xxiv), or regarding "religious dogma and political ideology" as "underpinning Ottoman governance, which forbade Christians a formal share in Ottoman sovereignty" (p. 5), Philliou constructs her book within a framework of such general and superficial concepts.

Rather than focusing on Vogorides and analyzing the political history of the period through the prism of his life experience, the author dwells on events such as the abolition of the janissaries, Muhammad Ali's revolt, and his campaign against Mahmud II, topics to which she brings no fresh research but for which she instead relies heavily on a few secondary sources such as the outdated Ph.D. dissertations of Howard Reed and Avigdor Levy, dated 1951 and 1968 respectively, on the abolition of the janissaries, and Henry Dodwell's 1976 publication, The Founder of Modern Egypt: A Study of Muhammad Ali, on the Greek rebellion and the international reaction to it. Philliou is also very partial to certain primary sources, such as the memoirs of the Englishman Reverend Robert Walsh for a depiction of the events in Istanbul in 1821, and Photeinos's history, published in 1818–1819 in Vienna, considered by Philliou as one of the "remarkable, highly valuable, and all but ignored" Phanariot sources (p. 43), for a narrative of the events of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. In contrast, her use of Ottoman sources, both archival material and published chronicles, is very limited. Her treatment of international discussions about the application of the Treaty of London held in Istanbul in 1832, for example, suffers from a conspicuous lack of Ottoman sources and is based largely on Dodwell's book and various British Public Record Office documents (pp. 111–117). Although she refers to two Ottoman documents on this issue, one is only tangentially relevant (p. 111, n. 21), while that from the Samos İradeleri (referred to on p. 115, n. 38) includes neither the catalogue number nor date. Certain material from the Ottoman archives on the Vogorides family is surprisingly not made use of in the book.

Some of Philliou's statements are somewhat unconvincing, particularly given the lack of supporting data. Can one really claim that Mahmud II was "desperate for information" (p. 125), that Istanbul "was like a gift in the 1830s, ready to be offered up to one of several recipients" (p. 107) but which was "in the end" handed over "not [to] one or another state or paşa" but to "the multistate arena of European politics" (p. 108), or that "The void left by phanariots at the Ottoman court . . . was particularly difficult for the sultan and his advisers to ignore in 1821–22, first and foremost because the dragoman had been a member of the court, therefore, someone whose physical absence was palpable to the sultan" (pp. 90–91)? Various comparisons made by Philliou also fail to convince, such as that between the demise of the Phanariots following the Greek revolt and that of the janissaries, between Vogorides and his "friend and rival" (p. 174) Muhammad Ali, or that between Mughal India and the Ottoman Empire (p. 9).

In short, this book neither contributes to an understanding of the Ottoman politics of the period, nor offers a convincing explanation for the central role the author attributes to the Phanariots in the running of Ottoman foreign relations, the Ottoman government's reaction to Vogorides's close relations with the British, nor to his owning "protégés" (p. 148) within the Ottoman state, nor does it fulfill its promise to do so through the biography of an individual. As the book's focal point, Vogorides loses his centrality, and Philliou's attempt to rescue the situation by inserting a series of sections headed "biography of an empire" fails to remedy this and instead introduces repetitions (for example, pp. 63–64, which repeats the information on law concerning the four Phanariot dynasties discussed earlier).

EBRU BOYAR

Middle East Technical University, Ankara

PAULA SANDERS. Creating Medieval Cairo: Empire, Religion, and Architectural Preservation in Nineteenth-Century Egypt. New York: American University in Cairo Press. 2008. Pp. xv, 216. $29.95.

Historical scholarship has for some time been understood as an ongoing project that constructs not the past but its reflection in the present. Not so with much of the research on cities, which often regards its subjects as straightforward expressions of their history. Paula Sanders challenges this tendency by providing a well-written and carefully argued account of the manner in which a medieval Cairo that was primarily focused on its Mamluk past was invented during the nineteenth century. Her book's most immediate precursor is Nezar AlSayyad, Irene Bierman, and Nasser Rabbat, editors, Making Cairo Medieval (2005). While the earlier book covers a wide range of concerns, its contributors focus primarily on the construction of medieval Cairo as a project of Orientalism. One of the great strengths of Sanders's work is that it examines an equally wide variety of sources and influences in an effort to understand the conflicted manner in which the conservation of the city and the image of its medieval past emerged—without imposing an oppositional narrative.

In the first two chapters, Sanders establishes the basic conditions under which Mamluk Cairo was made to be medieval under the auspices the Comité de Conservation des Monuments de l'Art Arabe (Comité). She begins this discussion by linking the preservation efforts of the Comité with British imperial practices, such as the Archaeological Survey of India (1861). The book then examines the relationship between prior attitudes to the preservation of Mamluk sites by religious endowments or waqfs during the Ottoman period and the emerging European sense of Ottoman decline and neglect that led to the Comité's preservation mandate. One particularly compelling aspect of Sanders' argument is her careful revelation of the different meanings of the Mamluk medieval identity of Cairo. The book shows that to the British, it defined Egyptians as backward and incapable of modernization, while to the Egyptians Cairo embodied an increasingly important "national" past.

The second chapter deepens the sense of competing views of medieval Cairo by contrasting the attitudes of Egyptian modernizers involved in religious and educational reforms with those of their British imperial counterparts. Muhammad 'Abduh (1849–1905), a jurist and religious scholar who called for a rejection of past interpretations of Islam and for acceptance of new subjects and materials, thought that preservation should be tied to the proper religious functioning of mosques. Although similarly supportive of religious and educational reform, 'Ali Mubarak (1823–1893), Minister of Public Works under Khedive Ismail, openly rejected preservation, arguing that Egyptian monuments should reflect the effects of time. On the British side, the book examines figures like Lord Cromer (1841–1917), Consul General of Egypt, whose view of Islam as a medieval religion incapable of reform fit well with the Comité's view that the preservation of Egyptian culture was a European responsibility.

The book's final chapters offer two quite specific, and arguably somewhat eccentric, examples of preservation. The first is an in-depth study of The One Thousand and One Nights, whose process of amalgamation as a literary text during the modern period is seen as analogous to the creation of a Mamluk medieval identity through the Comité's preservation activities. The final chapter examines relatively recent preservation projects in Cairo by the Dawoodi Bohras, a sect of Ismaili Shi'ites from the Indian subcontinent. This rather unfortunate choice effectively diffuses the impact of Sanders's scholarship relative to its main object of study: the construction of medieval Cairo during the nineteenth century. It also reveals a more general flaw in the book, which is that while it displays an impressive command of a broad range of issues, it sometimes lacks depth. Nevertheless, this book successfully shows that what we take to be historical sites that give us direct access to the past are, in fact, extremely problematic historical constructions. Its concluding chapter perhaps unwittingly indicates that not all contemporary preservationists have learned this lesson.

BRIAN L. McLAREN
University of Washington

FATMA MÜGE GÖÇEK. The Transformation of Turkey: Redefining State and Society from the Ottoman Empire to the Modern Era. (Library of Modern Middle East Studies, number 103.) New York: I. B. Tauris. 2011. Pp. viii, 310. £59.50.

This book interprets the history of the Turkish Republic through the lens of the late Ottoman period, from the Russo-Ottoman War of 1877–1878 and the Berlin Congress down to 1923, when the republic was established under Mustafa Kemal (Atatürk). It dissects Turkish politics to reveal at its center an all-powerful military apparatus, drawing its legitimacy from the “Sèvres Syndrome,” the perception of dangerous internal and external enemies threatening, often in collaboration, to destroy Turkey as they once did the Ottoman Empire. Fatma Müge Göçek examines the military’s continuous use of the Sèvres Syndrome, named after the unratified 1920 Treaty that would have divided up Anatolia among World War I’s victorious powers and allowed for the creation of an independent Kurdish state. Turkey’s most pressing issues—the Armenian, Cyprus, and Kurdish questions—all trace back to the late Ottoman period and thus, Göçek argues, must be considered together. The persistence of the Sèvres Syndrome is not just owed to the vagaries of memory, however. Those who ruled the Ottoman Empire during its final decade, the Committee of Union and Progress (CUP), also ruled the republic, if under different labels, for decades. Until 1973, all of the men who succeeded Mustafa Kemal as president had been members of the CUP. President Cemal Gürsel (1960–1966) and President Cevdet Sunay (1966–1973) both served in World War I and had been taken prisoner. Sèvres, as Göçek shows, imbued Turkish life with a national security culture that cast minorities as enemies, emasculated political parties that answered to military generals rather than an electorate, and scorned the individual rights and liberties of citizens. Göçek argues that Turkey continues to be defined by “the tense co-existence of the Ottoman past and the Republican present” (p. 12).

Drawing on a careful reading of memoirs, Göçek offers an astute assessment of rule under the CUP. She underscores the importance of political assassinations before 1914 and the ethnic cleansing and slaughter of the Armenian population beginning in 1915. She makes a powerful argument that without coming to terms with its past, the Turkish Republic will not be able to transform itself into a full-fledged democracy. Describing the lives of twelve Armenian intellectuals killed in 1915 and 1916, Göçek shows that these were remarkable individuals who had made significant contributions to Ottoman society. She suggests that these were victims in whose commemoration Turks today must join if Turkey is ever to come out of the shadow of Sèvres.

The military’s dominant role remained unfettered until the 1990s and the end of the Cold War, at which point economic liberalization could connect businesses and manufacturers directly to global markets. This economic opening paved the way for the formation of a new Anatolian bourgeoisie, which in turn propelled its own political organization, the Justice and Development Party (JDP). Göçek explores the irony behind the JDP’s embrace of European Union membership while the military, which had historically pushed for inclusion in Europe, now worried about its domestic supremacy and its enormous share of the state budget and opposed membership. With the formation of a new political and economic class in Turkey has come a questioning of the official Turkish historical narrative that sustained previous elites. One aspect of the new climate explored in the book is the appearance, in Turkish translation, of Armenian literature by authors who survived 1915 as well as works by their descendants. This literature, like Göçek’s book, is integral to demythologizing the context in which the Turkish Republic was born.

MUSTAFA AKSAKAL
Georgetown University

JOSHUA SCHREIER. Arabs of the Jewish Faith: The Civilizing Mission in Colonial Algeria. (Jewish Cultures of the World.) New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press. 2010. Pp. xiii, 233. $49.95.

Joshua Schreier’s well-researched and engaging monograph joins a growing number of English-language studies that focus on the neglected military phase (1830–1870) in the history of French Algeria. Conceptually, it adds critical dimensions to recent imperial histories that underline how “indigenous” communities—in this case, the Jews of Algeria—exerted counter-pressures on colonial power and impacted the discourses and practices of the civilizing mission. His research demonstrates convincingly how French policies of assimilation developed as “a strategic response” to Algerian realities and how the civilizing mission’s underlying ideology of modernization was appropriated purposefully by local and metropolitan Jewish elites with their own timetables for reform.

In this regard, the book provides key revisions to histories of French imperialism and the colonial regime in Algeria. Its title, taken from the words of a former prefect of Oran, summarizes effectively the tension at the heart of France’s indigenous administration until 1870: how to cultivate and regulate manifest boundaries between the colony’s Muslim and Jewish natives while keeping both groups at a conspicuous cultural distance from its European population. Here, Schreier delivers valuable and corrective material to our knowledge of the military period and reinforces with archival evidence the argument for a fuller integration of republican and imperial narratives of modern French history. The strength of his analytic framework resides in its capacity to set colonial processes against the backdrop of domestic developments, specifically, the French Revolutionary and Napoleonic experiments with Jewish emancipation between 1791 and 1808, and subsequent private and institutional pronouncements for or against the assimilation of Algerian Jews. Schreier is very skillful in exposing dissonance or echo in metropolitan and colonial attitudes toward North African Jewry, and his review of individual policies that aimed to separate faith from law, the private from the public and the "progressive" from the "archaic" opens promising prospects for historical inquiries into developing notions of modernity in nineteenth-century France.

On the whole, however, the scope of the book, in geographical and historical terms, is rather narrow. Schreier's overriding focus on the Jewish society of Oran, especially its elite members, invites—but does not address—questions about the conditions of North African Jewry before the French conquest and the general experiences of the colony's diverse Jewish populations, from the deep-rooted urban communities of Constantine or Tlemcen to the pastoral and nomadic groups of the southern oases, Laghouat, Souk Ahras, and the Mزاب.

Moreover, a handful of Schreier's conceptual claims merit deeper analysis. For example, while he is careful to treat colonial officialdom as heterogeneous, Schreier does not delve into the ideological variations within it, and he fails to expand upon the distinct uses and deployments of the term "civilization" by contentious and interested parties. The lack of clarity is compounded by overstating the military-civilian dichotomy in the face of growing evidence that the political and ideological divide between colonial officials was not so neatly compartmentalized. In the same vein, Schreier pays little regard to the influence of proponents of "colonial association" and anti-assimilationist Saint-Simonians, some of whom, like Gustave d'Eichtal, Olinde Rodrigues, or the brothers Émile and Isaac Pereire, were themselves Jewish and greatly concerned with cultural renewal in Algeria and France. As a result, despite his attentiveness to variability and adjustment in the French discourse on Algeria's Jews, Schreier is somehow more ready to concede an immutable character to colonial statements about Muslims. In reality, until the naturalization of most Algerian Jews by the Crémieux Decree in 1870, French colonial decrees concerning Muslim and Jewish religious instruction, family and gender relations, land ownership, and legal status were remarkably congruent, and the governing discourse on Islam tended to fluctuate just as much according to strategic calculation and the directives of political pragmatism.

These observations do not detract from the overall significance of this book to French Algerian studies. Ultimately, Schreier's findings should promote a more nuanced "third way" for reading the outcome of 1870.

Much less satisfying now are historical descriptions of the Crémieux Decree as a one-sided calculation made in France and imposed upon the colonialist establishment in Algeria. By the same token, his chapters also make clear that the political impulse for the Decree did not derive solely from France's differentiated civilizational posture toward Algerian Jews. Between these conventional interpretations, Schreier has suggested an alternative that situates the multiple French discourses on North African Jewry within the broader development of colonial categories and hierarchies of race. Thus, he makes possible the examination of the "constructedness" of colonial Jewish subjectivities against other operations of France's racial imaginary, such as the Kabyle Myth. To this extent, this book makes important strides toward the author's stated and laudable aim to tell "together" the histories of "the various sides and strategies of French colonialism" (p. 7).

OSAMA W. ABI-MERESHED
Georgetown University

SUB-SAHARAN AFRICA

CAROL POLSGROVE. Ending British Rule in Africa: Writers in a Common Cause. (Studies in Imperialism.) New York: Manchester University Press. 2009. Pp. xviii, 186. $89.95.

Carol Polsgrove possesses an acute historical intelligence. In Divided Minds: Intellectuals and the Civil Rights Movement (2001), she offered a thoughtful account of the often awkward relationship of publicly recognized intellectuals, of all political stripes, to civil rights in the 1950s and 1960s, a strangely neglected theme. She was also part of the small editorial team that assembled the magnificent two-volume Library of America collection, Reporting Civil Rights (2003). Her knowledge of black politics, and of the journalistic practices in which race politics was articulated, runs deep. Her new volume, which appears under the imprint of Manchester University Press's important, lively, and ever-expanding "Studies in Imperialism" series, takes a wider conspectus: the group of black, diasporic anti-colonial agitators who found themselves in the imperial capital of London in the 1930s. She tells the story of their efforts to fund, with negligible financial backing, the publication and distribution of pamphlets and periodicals that they hoped would find their way across oceans and bring alive a new politics among those Frantz Fanon called "the wretched of the earth."

This is a dramatic story to tell, and Polsgrove's steady hand does it justice. There is something riveting about both the paucity of the resources that the London militants could call upon and the global scope of their political investments. At the heart of the London network of Pan-Africanists were West Indians, C. L. R. James, George Padmore, and Ras Makonnen. Gathered around them were a minority of Africans, including Jomo Kenyatta, Kwame Nkrumah, and Hastings Banda, all of whom came to be tutored in the essentials of Pan-Africanism, notwithstanding their own particular evolutions when political power came their way. Close to them, too, was the future prime minister of Trinidad, Eric Williams. As the European colonial powers were engaged in collective destruction, the lineaments of the postcolonial order could be discerned in the lives of those anti-imperial agitators who congregated in the unforgiving urban landscape of the old metropole.

The broad contours of this history are well known. But Polsgrove's careful archival research does much to illuminate the emotional costs that incessant political activity, combined with daily economic penury, imposed upon the exiles who found themselves thrown together. Although Polsgrove feels compelled to recognize the grandeur of their collective enterprise and its moral worth, for the most part she eschews an epic tone. She is sensitive to the ways in which their hand-to-mouth daily existence registered inside their politics, and she charts the shifting emotional eddies through which the politics ran, and the consequent intimacies and fallings out. We see Peter Abrahams moving away from Padmore; the rifts appearing between Padmore and James; the shifting political allegiances of Richard Wright, whose later anticommunism led him to share ill-judged intimacies with U.S. intelligence agencies; the spats between James and Wright; and W. E. B. Du Bois's deep hostility to Wright's ethnographic account of his travels in independent Ghana.

It is not clear, finally, how Polsgrove chooses to read these episodes. There has long been a suspicion that relations between James and Padmore were not as harmonious as James's later tributes lead us to suppose. Maybe not. On the whole, however, seeing all these hurt feelings close up, as we do here, I tend to take a more skeptical view as to their political significance. They were real enough, and not unexpected. But, with some exceptions, too pointillist a reading can exaggerate their historical import.

Polsgrove's interpretation of the journalistic brio of the London Pan-Africanists is persuasive, and she is good on the diligence of the metropolitan and colonial states in attempting to censor or destroy a great swathe of the publications emanating from London. She demonstrates, as no one before her has done, the degree to which anticolonialism was a politics founded on the medium of the written word: the movement of cyclostyled sheets, on cheap paper, from dingy London workshops to distant, tropical locales offers a suitably subaltern rendering of empire, allowing us to focus on what generally remains unseen or overly abstract. The dynamic imperatives of empire had, from early on, propelled the movements, back and forth, of the written word, involving subtle transfigurations in thought itself; but so too they set in motion human lives and relationships, whose outcomes we are only now beginning to grasp.

BILL SCHWARZ

Queen Mary, University of London

Collected Essays

These volumes, recently received in the AHR office, do not lend themselves readily to unified reviews; the contents are therefore listed.

EUROPE: ANCIENT AND MEDIEVAL

CHRISTIAN KRÖTZL and KATARIINA MUSTAKALLIO, editors. On Old Age: Approaching Death in Antiquity and the Middle Ages. (Studies in the History of Daily Life, volume 2.) Tournhout, Belgium: Brepols. 2011. Pp. xix, 346. €80.00.

MARY HARLOW and RAY LAURENCE, Viewing the Old: Recording and Respecting the Elderly at Rome and in the Empire. TIM PARKIN, The Elderly Children of Greece and Rome. KATARIINA MUSTAKALLIO, Representing Older Women: Hersilia, Veturia, Virgo Vestalis Maxima. JILL BRADLEY, The Changing Face of Death: The Iconography of the Personification of Death in the Early Middle Ages. JUDIT MAJOROSSY, "I wish my body to hallowed ground": Testamentary Orders of the Burghers of Late Medieval Pressburg about Their Own Burial. ENNIO BAUER, Old Age as a Principle of Social Organization: Gerousiai in the Poleis of Hellenistic and Roman Southern Asia Minor. ALEKSANDR KOPTEV, The Massacre of Old Men by the Gauls in 390 BC and the Social Meaning of Old Age in Ancient Rome. KIRSI SALONEN, What Happened to Aged Priests in the Late Middle Ages? KATALIN SZENDE, Coping with Old Age in Medieval Hungarian Towns. EMILIA JAMROZIAK, Burials and Politics of the Living and the Dead in Scotland and Pomerania in the High Middle Ages: The Case of Two Cistercian Monasteries. JUSSI RANTALA, No Place for the Dead: Ludi Saeculares of 17 BC and the Purificatory Cults of May as Part of the Roman Ritual Year. ILDIKÓ CSEPREGI, Disease, Death, Destiny: The Healer as Soter in Miraculous Cures. IONA MCCLEERY, Medical Perspectives on Death in Late Medieval and Early Modern Europe. MIikka TAMMINEN, Who Deserves the Crown of Martyrdom: Martyrs in the Crusade Ideology of Jacques de Vitry (1160/70–1240). SARI KATAJALA-PELTOMAA, Rituals and Reputation: Immature Death in the Fourteenth-Century Canonization Processes. NIRIT BEN-ARYEH DEBBY, Pulpits and Tombs in Renaissance Florence.

THOMAS F. X. NOBLE and JOHN VAN ENGEN, editors. European Transformations: The Long Twelfth Century. (Notre Dame Conferences in Medieval Studies.) Notre Dame, Ind.: Notre Dame University Press. 2012. Pp. xi, 562. $65.00.

JOHN VAN ENGEN, The Twelfth Century: Reading, Reason, and Revolt. JOHN GILLINGHAM, A Historian of the Twelfth-Century Renaissance and the Transformation of English Society, 1066—ca. 1200. DOMINIQUE BARTHÉLEMY, Chivalric One-Upmanship in France, ca. 1100. ADAM J. KOSTO, Reconquest, Renaissance, and the Histories of Iberia, ca. 1000–1200. MAUREEN C. MILLER, Italy in the Long Twelfth Century: Ecclesiastical Reform and the Legitimization of a New Political Order, 1059–1183. HANNA VOLLRATH, Sutri 1046—Cannossa 1077—Rome 1111: Problems of Communications and the Perception of Neighbors. SVERRE BAGGE, The Europeanization of Europe: The Case of Scandinavia. PIOTR GÓRECKI, Ambiguous Beginnings: East Central Europe in the Making, 950–1200. DAVID NICHOLAS, Lords, Markets, and Communities: The Urban Revolution of the Twelfth Century. PAUL FREEDMAN, Peasants, the Seigneurial Regime, and Serfdom in the Eleventh to Thirteenth Centuries. OLIVIA REMIE CONSTABLE, Clothing, Iron, and Timber: The Growth of Christian Anxiety about Islam in the Long Twelfth Century. ANNA SAPIR ABULAFIA, Continuity and Change in Twelfth-Century Christian-Jewish Relations. ANDERS WINROTH, The Legal Revolution of the Twelfth Century. BARBARA NEWMAN, Liminalities: Literate Women in the Long Twelfth Century. JOHN MARENBON, Philosophy and Theology. BRIGITTE MIRIAM BEDOS-REZAK, Semiotic Anthropology: The Twelfth-Century Approach. RACHEL FULTON BROWN, Three-in-One: Making God in Twelfth-Century Liturgy, Theology, and Devotion. C. STEPHEN JAEGER, John of Salisbury, a Philosopher of the Long Eleventh Century.

EUROPE: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN

FLORENCE BUTTAY and AXELLE GUILLAUSSÉAU, editors. Des saints d'État? Politique et sainteté au temps du concile de Trente. (Collection Roland Mousnier.) Paris: Presses de l'Université Paris-Sorbonne. 2012. Pp. 184.

MIGUEL GOTOR, Le théâtre des saints modernes: La canonisation à l'âge baroque. CORNEL ZWIERLEIN, Les saints de la communion avec le Christ: Hybridations entre Églises et États dans le monde calviniste dans les années 1560. DAVID EL KENZ, Les martyres protestants du royaume de France face au concile de Trente: Affrontement et convergence. DAMIEN TRICOIRE, À la quête de l'universel: Constructions étatiques et patronages mariaux en Bavière et en France (de 1600 à 1660 environ). CÉCILE VINCENT-CASSY, Saint Michel et la Monarchie hispanique: L'invocation de la protection angélique en 1643. ANNICK DELFOSSE, Le patronage immaculiste des Pays-Bas: Une consécration manquée. NAÏMA GHERMANI, Des princes plutôt que des saints? Protestantisme, pouvoir politique et sainteté dans l'Allemagne du XVI siècle. MICHEL MERLE, Le portrait du saint prince: Les représentations du bienheureux Amédée IX de Savoie durant la seconde moitié du règne de Charles-Emmanuel Ier (1612–1630). CÉDRIC MICHON, Thomas More, saint ou chancelier? ÉRIC SUIRE, Du "saint dynastique" au "saint d'État."

SILVANA PATRIARCA and LUCY RIAL, editors. The Risorgimento Revisited: Nationalism and Culture in Nineteenth-Century Italy. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2012. Pp. xi, 303. $95.00.

PAUL GINSBORG, European Romanticism and the Italian Risorgimento. ADRIAN LYTTTELTON, The Hero and the People. SIMONETTA CHIAPPINI, From the People to the Masses: Political Developments in Italian Opera from Rossini to Mascagni. ARIANNA ARISI ROTA and ROBERTO BALZANI, Discovering Politics: Action and Recollection in the First Mazzinian Generation. ROS PESMAN, Mazzini and/in Love. MARINA D'AMELIA, Between Two Eras: Challenges Facing Women in the Risorgimento. SILVANA PATRIARCA, A Patriotic Emotion: Shame and the Risorgimento. LUCY RIAL, Men at War: Masculinity and Military Ideals in the Risorgimento. ALBERTO MARIO BANTI, The Remembrance of Heroes. MANUEL BORUTTA, Anti-Catholicism and the Culture War in Risorgimento Italy. TULLIA CATALAN, Italian Jews and the 1848–49 Revolutions: Patriotism and Multiple Identities. MAURIZIO ISABELLA, Liberalism and Empires in the Mediterranean: The View-Point of the Risorgimento. DOMINIQUE REILL, The Risorgimento: A Multi-national Movement.

MAARTEN VAN GINDERACHTER and MARNIX BEYEN, editors. Nationhood from Below: Europe in the Long Nineteenth Century. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2012. Pp. xi, 267. $85.00.

JOHN BREUILLY, What Does It Mean to Say that Nationalism is "Popular"? FERNANDO MOLINA and MIGUEL CABO VILLAVERDE, An Inconvenient Nation: Nation-Building and National Identity in Modern Spain; The Historiographical Debate. ILARIA PORCIANI, On the Uses and Abuses of Nationalism from Below: A Few Notes on Italy. LAURENCE COLE, Differentiation or Indifference? Changing Perspectives on National Identification in the Austrian Half of the Habsburg Monarchy. MAARTEN VAN GINDERACHTER, Nationhood from Below: Some Historiographic Notes on Great Britain, France and Germany in the Long Nineteenth Century. MIKA TERVONEN, The Nation and Its Outsiders: The "Gypsy Question" and Peasant Nationalism in Finland, c. 1863–1900. JAMES M. BROPHY, Which Political Nation? Soft Borders and Popular Nationhood in the Rhineland, 1800–1850. SAARTJE VANDEN BORRE and TOM VERSCHAFFEL, Between or Without Nations? Multiple Identifications among Belgian Migrants in Lille, Northern France, 1850–1900. JEAN-FRANÇOIS CHANET, "From the Wound a Flower Grows": A Re-Examination of French Patriotism in the Face of the Franco-Prussian War. ANTOON VRINTS, "All the Butter in the Country Belongs to Us, Belgians": Well-Being and Lower-Class National Identification in Belgium during the First World War.

MARTIN THOMAS, editor. The French Colonial Mind. Volume One, Mental Maps of Empire and Colonial En- counters. (France Overseas: Studies in Empire and Decolonization.) Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press. 2011. Pp. xlvii, 370. $45.00.

PATRICIA M. E. LORCIN, Reflections on the French Colonial Mind. EMMANUELLE SIBEUD, Intellectuals for Empire? The Imperial Training of Félicien Challaye, 1899–1914. RUTH GINIO, Colonial Minds and African Witchcraft: Interpretations of Murder as Seen in Cases from French West Africa in the Interwar Era. JOHN STRACHAN, The Colonial Cosmology of Fernand Braudel. ANNE RAFFIN, Mental Maps of Modernity in Colonial Indochina during World War II: Mobilizing Sport to Combat Threats to French Rule. KENNETH J. OROSZ, Anticlericalism, French Language Policy, and the Conflicted Colonial Mind in Cameroon, 1923–1939. MARÍA DEL MAR LOGROÑO NARBONA, Information and Intelligence Collection among Imperial Subjects Abroad: The Case of Syrians and Lebanese in Latin America, 1915–1930. JENNIFER M. DUECK, Religious Rivalry and Cultural Policymaking in Lebanon under the French Mandate. JAMES D. LE SUEUR, France's Arabic Educational Reforms in Algeria during the Colonial Era: Language Instruction in Colonial and Anticolonial Minds before and after Algerian Independence. MARTIN SHIPWAY, Thinking Like an Empire: Governor Henri Laurentie and Postwar Plans for the Late Colonial French "Empire-State". VÉRONIQUE DIMIER, Recycling Empire: French Colonial Administrators at the Heart of European Development Policy. TONY CHAFER, Friend or Foe? Competing Visions of Empire in French West Africa in the Run-up to Independence. TODD SHEPARD, Thinking between Metropole and Colony: The French Republic, "Exceptional Promotion," and the "Integration" of Algerians, 1955–1962. ALEXANDER KEESE, Rigged Elections: Democracy and Manipulation in the Late Colonial State in French West Africa and Togo, 1944–1958.

MARTIN THOMAS, editor. The French Colonial Mind. Volume Two, Violence, Military Encounters, and Colonialism. (France Overseas: Studies in Empire and Decolonization.) Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press. 2011. Pp. liii, 382. $45.00.

WILLIAM GALLOIS, Dahra and the History of Violence in Early Colonial Algeria. BERTRAND TAITHE, Losing Their Mind and Their Nation? Mimicry, Scandal, and Colonial Violence in the Voulet-Chanoine Affair. MICHAEL G. VANN, Fear and Loathing in French Hanoi: Colonial White Images and Imaginings of "Native" Violence. JOSHUA COLE, Anti-Semitism and the Colonial Situation in Interwar Algeria: The Anti-Jewish Riots in Constantine, August 1934. SAMUEL KALMAN, Fascism and Algérianité: The Croix de Feu and the Indigenous Question in 1930s Algeria. MARTIN THOMAS, Colonial Minds and Colonial Violence: The Sétif Uprising and the Savage Economics of Colonialism. OWEN WHITE, Conquest and Cohabitation: French Men's Relations with West African Women in the 1890s and 1900s. KIM MUNHOLLAND, The French Colonial Mind and the Challenge of Islam: The Case of Ernest Psichari. JOE LUNN, French Race Theory, the Parisian Society of Anthropology, and the Debate over la Force Noire, 1909–1912. MARTIN S. ALEXANDER, Colonial Minds Confounded: French Colonial Troops in the Battle of France, 1940. NEIL MACMASTER, The "Silent Native": Attentisme, Being Compromised, and Banal Terror during the Algerian War of Independence, 1954–1962. MATHILDE VON BÜLOW, Exposing the "Paradoxical Citizen- ship": French Authorities' Responses to the Algerian Presence in Federal Germany during the Algerian War, 1954–1962.

ALEX J. KAY, JEFF RUTHERFORD, and DAVID STAHEL, editors. Nazi Policy on the Eastern Front, 1941: Total War, Genocide, and Radicalization. (Rochester Studies in East and Central Europe.) Rochester: University of Rochester Press. 2012. Pp. x, 359. $85.00.

DAVID STAHEL, Radicalizing Warfare: The German Command and the Failure of Operation Barbarossa. ADRIAN E. WETTSTEIN, Urban Warfare Doctrine on the Eastern Front. FELIX RÖMER, The Wehrmacht in the War of Ideologies: The Army and Hitler's Criminal Orders on the Eastern Front. ALEX J. KAY, "The Purpose of the Russian Campaign Is the Decimation of the Slavic Population by Thirty Million": The Radicalization of German Food Policy in Early 1941. JEFF RUTHERFORD, The Radicalization of German Occupation Policies: The Wirtschaftsstab Ost and the 121st Infantry Division in Pavlovsk, 1941. PAOLO FONZI, The Exploitation of Foreign Territories and the Discussion of Ostland's Currency in 1941. WENDY LOWER, Axis Collaboration, Operation Barbarossa, and the Holocaust in Ukraine. LEONID REIN, The Radicalization of Anti-Jewish Policies in Nazi-Occupied Belarus. STEPHAN LEHNSTAEDT, The Minsk Experience: German Occupiers and Everyday Life in the Capital of Belarus. MARTIN HOLLER, Extending the Genocidal Program: Did Otto Ohlendorf Initiate the Systematic Extermination of Soviet "Gypsies"? THOMAS J. LAUB, The Development of German Policy in Occupied France, 1941, against the Backdrop of the War in the East.

Documents and Bibliographies

Books listed were recently received in the AHR office. Works of these types cannot normally be reviewed by the AHR.

COMPARATIVE/WORLD

PIETSCH, THEODORE W. Trees of Life: A Visual History of Evolution. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press. 2012. Pp. xi, 358. $69.95.

ASIA

HUINENG. The Platform Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch: The Text of the Tun-Huang Manuscript. Foreword by MORTEN SCHLÜTTER. Translated by PHILIP B. YAMPOLSKY. (Translations from the Asian Classics.) Reprint. New York: Columbia University Press. 2012. Pp. xvi, 216. Cloth $99.50, paper $32.50, e-book $25.99.

CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

ADAMS, HENRY. Henry Adams in the Secession Crisis: Dispatches to the Boston Daily Advertiser, December 1860–March 1861. Edited by MARK J. STEGMAIER. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press. 2012. Pp. xvi, 237. $42.50.

BENNETT, M. TODD, and EDWARD C. KEEFER, editors. Foreign Relations of the United States, 1969–1976. Volume XXXIV: National Security Policy, 1969–1972. Washington, D.C.: United States Government Printing Office. 2011. Pp. xxviii, 1064. $79.00.

GOINGS, HENRY. Rambles of a Runaway from Southern Slavery. Edited by CALVIN SCHERMERHORN, MICHAEL PLUNKETT, and EDWARD GAYNOR. (Carter G. Woodson Institute Series.) Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press. 2012. Pp. xxxvi, 157. $45.00.

LOWENTHAL, DAVID. The Mind and Art of Abraham Lincoln, Philosopher Statesman: Texts and Interpretations of Twenty Great Speeches. Lanham, Md.: Lexington Books. 2012. Pp. viii, 288. Cloth $85.00, paper $36.99.

MCKIVIGAN, JOHN R., and HEATHER L. KAUFMAN, editors. In the Words of Frederick Douglass: Quotations from Liberty's Champion. Foreword by JOHN STAUFFER. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press. 2012. Pp. xxi, 256. $22.95.

ROBINSON, GREG, editor. Pacific Citizens: Larry and Guyo Tajiri and Japanese American Journalism in the World War II Era. Foreword by HARRY K. HONDA. (The Asian American Experience.) Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press. 2012. Pp. xxxix, 295. $60.00.

RYAN, KATY, editor. Demands of the Dead: Executions, Storytelling, and Activism in the United States. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press. 2012. Pp. xii, 315. $39.95.

SELVAGE, DOUGLAS E., MELISSA JANE TAYLOR, and EDWARD C. KEEFER, editors. Foreign Relations of the United States, 1969–1976. Volume XV: Soviet Union, June 1972–August 1974. Washington, D.C.: United States Government Printing Office. 2011. Pp. xxxi, 1061. $79.00.

CARIBBEAN AND LATIN AMERICA

DÍAZ DEL CASTILLO, BERNAL. The True History of the Conquest of New Spain. Translated by JANET BURKE and TED HUMPHREY. Indianapolis and Cambridge: Hackett Publishing Company, Inc. 2012. Pp. xlvii, 448. Paper $15.95, e-book $14.50.

EUROPE: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN

DE ARÉVALO, RODRIGO SÁNCHEZ. Rodrigo Sánchez de Arévalo: Tratado sobre la división del reino y cuándo es lícita la primogenitura. Edited by JESÚS ÁNGEL SOLÓRZANO TELECHEA. Translated by JOSÉ CARLOS MIRALLES MALDONADO. (Ciencias Históricas, number 20.) Logroño: Instituto de Estudios Riojanos. 2011. Pp. 222.

CALLAGHAN, JOHN, and BEN HARKER. British Communism: A Documentary History. (Documents in Modern History.) New York: Manchester University Press. 2011. Pp. 304. $38.95.

HOLMAN, HANNAH. Titanic Voices: 63 Survivors Tell Their Extraordinary Stories. Stroud, UK: Amberley. 2011. Pp. 436. $29.95.

MONFASANI, JOHN. 'Bessarion Scholasticus': A Study of Cardinal Bessarion's Latin Library. (Byzantios: Studies in Byzantine History and Civilization, number 3.) Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols. 2011. Pp. xiv, 306. €65.00.

MIDDLE EAST AND NORTHERN AFRICA

HALEVI, SA'ADI BEN BETSALEL. A Jewish Voice from Ottoman Salonica: The Ladino Memoir of Sa'adi Besalel a-Levi. Edited by ARON RODRIGUE and SARAH ABREVAYA STEIN. Translated by ISAAC JERUSALMI. (Stanford Studies in Jewish History and Culture.) Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press. 2012. Pp. lx, 372. Cloth $50.00, e-book $50.00.

Other Books Received

The following books were recently received in the AHR office. Books listed here do not include works scheduled for review.

METHODS/THEORY

- ALLEN, BENJAMIN MARK, and DAHIA MESSARA, editors. The Captivity Narrative: Enduring Shackles and Emancipating Language of Subjectivity. Newcastle: Cambridge Scholars Publishing. 2012. Pp. xviii, 142. $59.99.
- DE BAECQUE, ANTOINE. Camera Historica: The Century in Cinema. Translated by NINON VINSONNEAU and JONATHAN MAGIDOFF. (European Perspectives: A Series in Social Thought and Cultural Criticism.) New York: Columbia University Press. 2012. Pp. xv, 398. Cloth $105.00, paper $35.00.
- BAOFU, PETER. The Future of Post-Human History: A Preface to a New Theory of Universality and Relativity. Newcastle: Cambridge Scholars Publishing. 2012. Pp. xxv, 591. $97.99.
- LEGG, STEPHEN, editor. Spatiality, Sovereignty and Carl Schmitt: Geographies of the Nomos. (Interventions.) New York: Routledge. 2011. Pp. xiv, 306. Cloth $138.00, paper $42.95.
- OGRIN, MIRCEA. Ernst Bernheim (1850–1942): Historiker und Wissenschaftspolitiker im Kaiserreich und in der Weimarer Republik. (Pallas Athene: Beiträge zur Universitäts- und Wissenschaftsgeschichte, number 40.) Stuttgart: Franz Steiner Verlag. 2012. Pp. 374. €52.00.
- ditions of Restricted Political Freedom. New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. xxx, 288. $49.99.
- DASCĂL, REGHINA, editor. Episodes from a History of Undoing: The Heritage of Female Subversiveness. Newcastle: Cambridge Scholars Publishing. 2012. Pp. xii, 211. $59.99.
- DAVIDSON, LAWRENCE. Cultural Genocide. (Genocide, Political Violence, Human Rights Series.) New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press. 2012. Pp. vii, 149. $23.95.
- DORMANDY, THOMAS. Opium: Reality's Dark Dream. New Haven: Yale University Press. 2012. Pp. x, 366. $40.00.
- FERBER, SARAH, and SALLY WILDE, editors. The Body Divided: Human Beings and Human 'Material' in Modern Medical History. (The History of Medicine in Context.) Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate Publishing Company. 2011. Pp. xi, 249. $124.95.
- HATTENDORF, JOHN B. Talking about Naval History: A Collection of Essays. (Naval War College Historical Monograph Series, number 19.) Newport, R.I.: Naval War College Press. 2011. Pp. xiv, 354. $54.00.
- LUTHER, INGA, et al. Erinnerung schreibt Geschichte: Lateinamerika und Europa im Kontext transnationaler Verflechtungen. (Historamericana, number 25.) Stuttgart: Akademischer Verlag Stuttgart. Mexico City: Colegio Internacional de Graduados Entre Espacios. Stuttgart: Verlag Hans-Dieter Heinz. 2011. Pp. 278. €29.50.

COMPARATIVE/WORLD

- BANKOFF, GREG, EWE LÜBKEN, and JORDAN SAND, editors. Flammable Cities: Urban Conflagration and the Making of the Modern World. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press. 2012. Pp. vii, 409. Paper $29.95, e-book $21.95.
- BANNET, EVE TAVOR, and SUSAN MANNING, editors. Transatlantic Literary Studies, 1660–1830. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2012. Pp. xiii, 281. $90.00.
- BORNEMAN, JOHN. Political Crime and the Memory of Loss. (New Anthropologies of Europe.) Bloomington: Indiana University Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 243. $27.95.
- BOUGHTON, JAMES M. Tearing Down Walls: The International Monetary Fund 1990–1999. Washington, D.C.: International Monetary Fund. 2012. Pp. lxvii, 968. $90.00.
- BRYSK, ALISON, and AUSTIN CHOI-FITZPATRICK, editors. From Human Trafficking to Human Rights: Reframing Contemporary Slavery. (Pennsylvania Studies in Human Rights.) Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 2012. Pp. vi, 268. $49.95.
- CAMPBELL, GWYN, SUZANNE MIERS, and JOSEPH C. MILLER, editors. Child Slaves in the Modern World. Athens, Ohio: Ohio University Press. 2011. Pp. vi, 281. Cloth $49.95, paper $24.95.
- DAMOUI, JOY, and MARIANO BEN PLOTKIN, editors. Psychoanalysis and Politics: Histories of Psychoanalysis under Con-
- ditions of Restricted Political Freedom. New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. xxx, 288. $49.99.
- DASCĂL, REGHINA, editor. Episodes from a History of Undoing: The Heritage of Female Subversiveness. Newcastle: Cambridge Scholars Publishing. 2012. Pp. xii, 211. $59.99.
- DAVIDSON, LAWRENCE. Cultural Genocide. (Genocide, Political Violence, Human Rights Series.) New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press. 2012. Pp. vii, 149. $23.95.
- DORMANDY, THOMAS. Opium: Reality's Dark Dream. New Haven: Yale University Press. 2012. Pp. x, 366. $40.00.
- FERBER, SARAH, and SALLY WILDE, editors. The Body Divided: Human Beings and Human 'Material' in Modern Medical History. (The History of Medicine in Context.) Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate Publishing Company. 2011. Pp. xi, 249. $124.95.
- HATTENDORF, JOHN B. Talking about Naval History: A Collection of Essays. (Naval War College Historical Monograph Series, number 19.) Newport, R.I.: Naval War College Press. 2011. Pp. xiv, 354. $54.00.
- LUTHER, INGA, et al. Erinnerung schreibt Geschichte: Lateinamerika und Europa im Kontext transnationaler Verflechtungen. (Historamericana, number 25.) Stuttgart: Akademischer Verlag Stuttgart. Mexico City: Colegio Internacional de Graduados Entre Espacios. Stuttgart: Verlag Hans-Dieter Heinz. 2011. Pp. 278. €29.50.
- MACKINNON, ARAN, and ELAINE MCCLARNAND MACKINNON, editors. Places of Encounter: Time, Place, and Connectivity in World History. Volume 1: To 1600. Boulder, Colo.: Westview. 2012. Pp. xxx, 250. $38.00.
- MACKINNON, ARAN, and ELAINE MCCLARNAND MACKINNON, editors. Places of Encounter: Time, Place, and Connectivity in World History. Volume 2: Since 1500. Boulder, Colo.: Westview. 2012. Pp. xxx, 270. $38.00.
- MCANANY, EMILE G. Saving the World: A Brief History of Communication for Development and Social Change. (The History of Communication.) Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press. 2012. Pp. x, 181. Cloth $80.00, paper $25.00.
- NIELSON, KRISTIAN H., MICHAEL HARBSMEIER, and CHRISTOPHER J. RIES, editors. Scientists and Scholars in the Field: Studies in the History of Fieldwork and Expeditions. Aarhus, Denmark: Aarhus University Press. 2012. Pp. 476. $67.00.
- OSTROM, VINCENT. The Quest to Understand Human Affairs. Volume Two: Essays on Collective, Constitutional, and Epistemic Choice. Foreword by ELINOR OSTROM. Edited by BARBARA ALLEN. Lanham, Md.: Lexington Books. 2012. Pp. xxviii, 657. Cloth $120.00, paper $54.95.
- PETERSON, MARINA, and GARY W. McDONOGH, editors. Global Downtowns. (The City in the Twenty-First Century.) Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 2012. Pp. vii, 360. $59.95.
- PETROSKI, HENRY. To Forgive Design: Understanding Failure. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press. 2012. Pp. xii, 410. $27.95.

RUIZ, MARIA ISABEL ROMERO, editor. Women's Identities and Bodies in Colonial and Postcolonial History and Literature. Newcastle: Cambridge Scholars Publishing. 2012. Pp. xiv, 171. $52.99.

VASQUEZ, JOHN A., editor. What Do We Know about War? 2d ed. Lanham, Md.: Rowman and Littlefield. 2012. Pp. xix, 390. Cloth $85.00, paper $49.95, e-book $48.99.

WAGG, STEPHEN, editor. Myths and Milestones in the History of Sport. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. xi, 315. $85.00.

WEART, SPENCER R. The Rise of Nuclear Fear. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press. 2012. Pp. ix, 367. $21.95.

ASIA

ANSHIN, ANATOLIY. The Truth of the Ancient Ways: A Critical Biography of the Swordsman Yamaoka Tesshu. New York: Kodensha Institute. 2012. Pp. xv, 186. $35.00.

CHOU, EVA SHAN. Memory, Violence, Queues: Lu Xun Interprets China. (Asia Past and Present: New Research from AAS.) Ann Arbor, Mich.: Association for Asian Studies. 2012. Pp. viii, 333. $25.00.

DALTON, DENNIS. Mahatma Gandhi: Nonviolent Power in Action. Reprint. New York: Columbia University Press. 2012. Pp. xxiv, 311. Cloth $84.50, paper $27.50, e-book $21.99.

FRIDAY, KARL F., editor. Japan Emerging: Premodern History to 1850. Boulder, Colo.: Westview. 2012. Pp. xviii, 478. $49.00.

HEISIG, JAMES W., and TIMOTHY W. RICHARDSON. Remembering Simplified Hanzi: How Not to Forget the Meaning and Writing of Chinese Characters; Book 2. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press. 2012. Pp. v, 329. $29.00.

HOLDSWORTH, MAY, and CHRISTOPHER MUNN, editors. Diction-ary of Hong Kong Biography. Hong Kong: Hong Kong Uni-versity Press. 2012. Pp. xiv, 525. $75.00.

LOOMBA, ANIA, and RITTY A. LUKOSE, editors. South Asian Feminisms. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press. 2012. Pp. vii, 422. Cloth $99.95, paper $27.95.

MAIR, VICTOR H., and TANSSEN SEN. Traditional China in Asian and World History. (Key Issues in Asian Studies, number 9.) Ann Arbor, Mich.: Association for Asian Studies. 2012. Pp. xxi, 108. $10.00.

MCNEILLY, MARK R. Sun Tzu and the Art of Business: Six Strategic Principles for Managers. Rev. ed. New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. x, 330. $19.95.

PANG, LAIKWAN. Creativity and Its Discontents: China's Creative Industries and Intellectual Property Rights Offenses. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press. 2012. Pp. ix, 299. Cloth $89.95, paper $24.95.

PILZER, JOSHUA D. Hearts of Pine: Songs in the Lives of Three Korean Survivors of the Japanese "Comfort Women." New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. xv, 191. $24.95.

ROCES, MINA. Women's Movements and the Filipina, 1986–2008. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press. 2012. Pp. x, 277. $55.00.

SCHLÜTTER, MORTEN, and STEPHEN F. TEISER, editors. Readings of the Platform Sūtra. (Columbia Readings of Buddhist Literature.) New York: Columbia University Press. 2012. Pp. ix, 220. Cloth $82.50, paper $27.50, e-book $21.99.

OCEANIA AND THE PACIFIC ISLANDS

ROBINSON, SHIRLEENE, and JULIE USTINOFF, editors. The 1960s in Australia: People, Power and Politics. Newcastle: Cam-bridge Scholars Publishing. 2012. Pp. xvii, 253. $59.99.

CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

BAGUR, JACQUES D. Antebellum Jefferson, Texas: Everyday Life in an East Texas Town. Denton: University of North Texas Press. 2012. Pp. 612. $55.00.

BARRETT, ELINORE M. The Spanish Colonial Settlement Land-scapes of New Mexico, 1598–1680. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press. 2012. Pp. xvi, 280. $49.95.

BATISTE, STEPHANIE LEIGH. Darkening Mirrors: Imperial Rep-resentation in Depression-Era African American Perfor-mance. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press. 2011. Pp. xx, 326. Cloth $94.95, paper $25.95.

BAUMAN, JOHN F. Gateway to Vacationland: The Making of Port-land, Maine. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press. 2012. Pp. xvii, 285. $26.95.

BLACK, SAMUEL W., and REGENNIA N. WILLIAMS. Through the Lens of Allen E. Cole: A History of African Americans in Cleveland, Ohio. Foreword by DEBORAH WILLIS. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, in cooperation with the Western Reserve Historical Society. 2012. Pp. xii, 132. $49.00.

BLEVINS, BROOKS. Ghost of the Ozarks: Murder and Memory in the Upland South. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illi-nois Press. 2012. Pp. xxii, 261. $29.95.

BODENHAMER, DAVID J. The Revolutionary Constitution. New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. 281. $29.95.

BODROGHKOZY, ANIKO. Equal Time: Television and the Civil Rights Movement. (The History of Communication.) Ur-bana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press. 2012. Pp. x, 265. $50.00.

BORDEWICH, FERGUS M. America's Great Debate: Henry Clay, Stephen A. Douglas, and the Compromise that Preserved the Union. New York: Simon and Schuster. 2012. Pp. x, 480. $30.00.

BRATT, JAMES D., editor. By the Vision of Another World: Wor-ship in American History. (The Calvin Institute of Christian Worship Liturgical Studies.) Grand Rapids, Mich.: William B. Eerdmans. 2012. Pp. viii, 213. $25.00.

BROADWATER, JEFF. James Madison: A Son of Virginia and a Founder of the Nation. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 2012. Pp. xvi, 266. $30.00.

BROCK, PEGGY. The Many Voyages of Arthur Wellington Clah: A Tsimshian Man on the Pacific Northwest Coast. Vancou-ver: UBC Press. 2011. Pp. xviii, 306. Cloth $99.00, paper $32.95.

BROOTEN, BERNADETTE J., editor. Beyond Slavery: Overcoming Its Religious and Sexual Legacies. With the editorial assis-tance of JACQUELINE L. HAZELTON. (Black Religion/Wom-anist Thought/Social Justice Series.) New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2010. Pp. vi, 352. Cloth $95.00, paper $29.00.

BROUSSARD, ALBERT S. Expectations of Equality: A History of Black Westerners. (The Western History Series.) Wheeling, Ill.: Harlan Davidson, with the Buffalo Bill Historical Cen-ter. 2012. Pp. xvii, 247. $21.95.

BROWN, ANDREW. Keeper of the Nuclear Conscience: The Life and Work of Joseph Rotblat. New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. xviii, 347. $29.95.

BUCCOLA, NICHOLAS. The Political Thought of Frederick Doug-las: In Pursuit of American Liberty. New York: New York University Press. 2012. Pp. x, 215. $49.00.

BURTON, ORVILLE VERNON, JERALD PODAIR, and JENNIFER L. WEBER, editors. The Struggle for Equality: Essays on Sec-tional Conflict, the Civil War, and the Long Reconstruction. With a conversation with JAMES MCPHERSON. Charlottes-ville: University of Virginia Press. 2011. Pp. viii, 306. $45.00.

CAPS, JOHN. Henry Mancini: Reinventing Film Music. (Music in American Life.) Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press. 2012. Pp. 278. $29.95.

- COCKE, CLYDE W. Pass in Review: An Illustrated History of West Point Cadets, 1794–Present. Photos by EILENE HARKLESS MOORE. Oxford: Osprey. 2012. Pp. xix, 172. $29.95.
- COEN, ROSS. Breaking Ice for Arctic Oil: The Epic Voyage of the SS Manhattan through the Northwest Passage. Fairbanks: University of Alaska Press. 2012. Pp. xiii, 215. $24.95.
- COLEMAN, JON T. Here Lies Hugh Glass: A Mountain Man, a Bear, and the Rise of the American Nation. (An American Portrait.) New York: Hill and Wang. 2012. Pp. xiii, 252. $28.00.
- CONWAY, J. NORTH. Bag of Bones: The Sensational Grave Robbery of the Merchant Prince of Manhattan. Guilford, Conn.: Lyons Press. 2012. Pp. xiv, 289. $24.95.
- COOK-LYNN, ELIZABETH. A Separate Country: Postcoloniality and American Indian Nations. Lubbock: Texas Tech University Press. 2012. Pp. xvii, 216. $35.00.
- COOPER, VALERIE C. Word, Like Fire: Maria Stewart, the Bible, and the Rights of African Americans. (Carter G. Woodson Institute Series.) Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 209. $39.50.
- DECHERNEY, PETER. Hollywood's Copyright Wars: From Edison to the Internet. (Film and Culture.) New York: Columbia University Press. 2012. Pp. xii, 287. $34.50.
- DONOHUE, KATHLEEN G., editor. Liberty and Justice for All? Rethinking Politics in Cold War America. (Culture, Politics, and the Cold War.) Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press. 2012. Pp. vi, 392. $29.95.
- DORSEN, DAVID M. Henry Friendly: Greatest Judge of His Era. Foreword by RICHARD A. POSNER. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press. 2012. Pp. xiii, 498. $35.00.
- DRURY, BOB, and TOM CLAVIN. Last Men Out: The True Story of America's Heroic Final Hours in Vietnam. Paperback edition. New York: Free Press. 2012. Pp. x, 293. $15.00.
- DUNKELMAN, MARK H. Marching with Sherman: Through Georgia and the Carolinas with the 154th New York. (Conflicting Worlds: New Dimensions of the American Civil War.) Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press. 2012. Pp. 276. $39.95.
- DUVALL, JOHN N., editor. The Cambridge Companion to American Fiction after 1945. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2012. Pp. xvi, 271. Cloth $90.00, paper $24.99.
- FEDE, ANDREW. Roadblocks to Freedom: Slavery and Manumission in the United States South. (Legal History and Biography.) New Orleans: Quid Pro Books. 2011. Pp. xx, 395. Cloth $56.99, paper $38.99.
- FESTLE, MARY JO. Second Wind: Oral Histories of Lung Transplant Survivors. (Palgrave Studies in Oral History.) New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2012. Pp. xvi, 280. $90.00.
- FOWLER, DON D., editor. Cleaving an Unknown World: The Powell Expeditions and the Scientific Exploration of the Colorado Plateau. Foreword by ROY WEBB. Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press, with the Utah State Historical Society. 2012. Pp. xx, 251. $24.95.
- GABACCIA, DONNA R. Foreign Relations: American Immigration in Global Perspective. (America in the World.) Princeton: Princeton University Press. 2012. Pp. xi, 271. $29.95.
- GARBADE, KENNETH D. Birth of a Market: The U.S. Treasury Securities Market from the Great War to the Great Depression. Cambridge, Mass.: MIT Press. 2012. Pp. viii, 393. $50.00.
- GASMAN, MARYBETH, and LOUIS W. SULLIVAN. The Morehouse Mystique: Becoming a Doctor at the Nation's Newest African American Medical School. Foreword by BARBARA BUSH. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press. 2012. Pp. xiv, 182. $35.00.
- GILPIN, ALEC R. The War of 1812 in the Old Northwest. Introduction by BRIAN LEIGH DUNNIGAN. Reprint. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press. 2012. Pp. xiii, 286. $24.95.
- GOTTFRIED, PAUL EDWARD. Leo Strauss and the Conservative Movement in America: A Critical Appraisal. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2012. Pp. ix, 182. $90.00.
- GRANT, SUSAN-MARY. A Concise History of the United States of America. (Cambridge Concise Histories.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 2012. Pp. xv, 454. Cloth $99.00, paper $24.99.
- GRAUER, NEIL A. Leading the Way: A History of Johns Hopkins Medicine. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Medicine, in association with Johns Hopkins University Press. 2012. Pp. ix, 405. $60.00.
- GREENE, ABNER S. Against Obligation: The Multiple Sources of Authority in a Liberal Democracy. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 2012. Pp. viii, 333. $49.95.
- GUGLIOTTA, GUY. Freedom's Cap: The United States Capitol and the Coming of the Civil War. New York: Hill and Wang. 2012. Pp. viii, 486. $35.00.
- HAMMES, DAVID L. Harvesting Gold: Thomas Edison's Experiment to Re-invent American Money. Silver City, N.Mex.: Richard Mahler Publications. 2012. Pp. vi, 154. $8.99.
- HARRIS, MATTHEW L., and JAY H. BUCKLEY, editors. Zebulon Pike, Thomas Jefferson, and the Opening of the American West. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press. 2012. Pp. x, 242. $29.95.
- HARVEY, PAUL. Moses, Jesus, and the Trickster in the Evangelical South. (Mercer University Lamar Memorial Lectures, number 52.) Athens: University of Georgia Press. 2012. Pp. xi, 182. $28.95.
- HESS, EARL J. The Civil War in the West: Victory and Defeat from the Appalachians to the Mississippi. (The Littlefield History of the Civil War Era.) Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 2012. Pp. xv, 392. $40.00.
- HILL, CLINT. Mrs. Kennedy and Me. With LISA MCCUBBIN. New York: Gallery Books. 2012. Pp. viii, 343. $26.00.
- HOCHSCHILD, JENNIFER, VESLA WEAVER, and TRACI BURCH. Creating a New Racial Order: How Immigration, Multiracialism, Genomics, and the Young Can Remake Race in America. Princeton: Princeton University Press. 2012. Pp. xviii, 260. $29.95.
- HOLZER, HAROLD. Emancipating Lincoln: The Proclamation in Text, Context, and Memory. (The Nathan I. Huggins Lectures.) Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 2012. Pp. 213. $24.95.
- HOWELL, KENNETH W., editor. Still the Arena of Civil War: Violence and Turmoil in Reconstruction Texas, 1865–1874. Denton: University of North Texas Press. 2012. Pp. xii, 445. $34.95.
- HUTCHISON, COLEMAN. Apples and Ashes: Literature, Nationalism, and the Confederate States of America. (The New Southern Studies.) Athens: University of Georgia Press. 2012. Pp. 277. Cloth $59.95, paper $24.95.
- ISTO, SARAH CRAWFORD. The Fur Farms of Alaska: Two Centuries of History and a Forgotten Stampede. Fairbanks: University of Alaska Press. 2012. Pp. xi, 230. $29.95.
- JACKSON, BRUCE, and DIANE CHRISTIAN. In This Timeless Time: Living and Dying on Death Row in America. (Documentary Arts and Culture.) With DVD. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, in association with the Center for Documentary Studies at Duke University. 2012. Pp. xiv, 242. $35.00.
- JACKSON, LAWRENCE P. My Father's Name: A Black Virginia Family after the Civil War. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 2012. Pp. x, 243. $25.00.
- JACOBSON, MARION. Squeeze This! A Cultural History of the Accordion in America. (Folklore Studies in a Multicultural World.) Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press. 2012. Pp. xi, 256. $29.95.
- JAFFE, STEVEN H. New York at War: Four Centuries of Combat, Fear, and Intrigue in Gotham. New York: Basic Books. 2012. Pp. xviii, 404. $29.99.
- JEANSONNE, GLEN. The Life of Herbert Hoover: Fighting Quaker,

- 1928–1933. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2012. Pp. xxi, 539. $60.00.
- JENKINS, PHILIP. A History of the United States. (Palgrave Essential Histories.) 4th ed. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2012. Pp. xxiv, 336. Cloth $90.00, paper $27.00.
- JOHNSON, PAUL E., and SEAN WILENTZ. The Kingdom of Matthias: A Story of Sex and Salvation in 19th-Century America. Updated edition. New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. xi, 234. $19.95.
- JORDAN, WINTHROP D. White over Black: American Attitudes toward the Negro, 1550–1812. Forewords by CHRISTOPHER LESLIE BROWN and PETER H. WOOD. 2d ed. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, for the Omohundro Institute of Early American History and Culture, Williamsburg, Va. 2012. Pp. xl, 651. Cloth $70.00, paper $29.95.
- KAHAN, PAUL. Seminary of Virtue: The Ideology and Practice of Inmate Reform at Eastern State Penitentiary, 1829–1971. New York: Peter Lang Publishing. 2012. Pp. xviii, 201. $32.95.
- KATZ, HARRY L., and VINCENT VIRGA. Civil War Sketch Book: Drawings from the Battlefield. Preface by ALAN BRINKLEY. New York: W.W. Norton and Company. 2012. Pp. xxv, 251. $50.00.
- KISSINGER, HENRY. On China. Paperback edition. New York: Penguin. 2012. Pp. xviii, 604. $18.00.
- KNOTT, STEPHEN F. Rush to Judgment: George W. Bush, the War on Terror, and His Critics. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas. 2012. Pp. ix, 236. $29.95.
- KREHBIEL, NICHOLAS A. General Lewis B. Hershey and Conscientious Objection during World War II. (The American Military Experience Series.) Columbia: University of Missouri Press. 2011. Pp. xi, 201. $40.00.
- LA GUARDIA-KOTITE, MARTHA, and TRISH MARX. My Name Is Old Glory: A Celebration of the Star-Spangled Banner. Foreword by THAD W. ALLEN. Guilford, Conn.: Lyons Press. 2012. Pp. viii, 119. $16.95.
- LINGENFELTER, RICHARD E. Bonanzas and Borrascas: Gold Lust and Silver Sharks, 1848–1884. (Western Lands and Waters Series, number 26.) Norman, Okla.: Arthur H. Clark Company. 2012. Pp. 461. $40.00.
- LINGENFELTER, RICHARD E. Bonanzas and Borrascas: Copper Kings and Stock Frenzies, 1885–1918. (Western Lands and Waters Series, number 27.) Norman, Okla.: Arthur H. Clark Company. 2012. Pp. 586. $40.00.
- LOGUSZ, MICHAEL O. With Musket and Tomahawk. Volume 2, The Mohawk Valley Campaign in the Wilderness War of 1777. Havertown, Pa: Casemate. 2012. Pp. 262. $32.95.
- LONG, CAROLYN MORROW. Madame Lalaurie: Mistress of the Haunted House. Gainesville: University Press of Florida. 2012. Pp. xii, 258. $24.95.
- LÓPEZ, A. RICARDO, and BARBARA WEINSTEIN, editors. The Making of the Middle Class: Toward a Transnational History. Afterword by MRINALINI SINHA. (Radical Perspectives: A Radical History Review Book Series.) Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press. 2012. Pp. xi, 446. Cloth $99.95, paper $27.95.
- LUNDBERG, JOHN R. Granbury's Texas Brigade: Diehard Western Confederates. (Conflicting Worlds: New Dimensions of the American Civil War.) Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press. 2012. Pp. xii, 321. $39.95.
- MANI, BAKIRATHI. Aspiring to Home: South Asians in America. (Asian America.) Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press. 2012. Pp. xii, 311. Cloth $85.00, paper $27.95.
- MAZOR, BARRY. Meeting Jimmie Rodgers: How America's Original Roots Music Hero Changed the Pop Sounds of a Century. Paperback edition. New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. viii, 376. $19.95.
- MAZOW, LEO G. Thomas Hart Benton and the American Sound. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press. 2012. Pp. xvi, 200. $79.95.
- MCGINTY, BRIAN. A Toast to Eclipse: Arpad Haraszthy and the Sparkling Wine of Old San Francisco. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press. 2012. Pp. xii, 244. $29.95.
- MCWHIRTER, CHRISTIAN. Battle Hymns: The Power and Popularity of Music in the Civil War. (Civil War America.) Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 2012. Pp. viii, 321. $39.95.
- MILLER, CHAR. Public Lands, Public Debates: A Century of Controversy. Corvallis: Oregon State University Press. 2012. Pp. vi, 186. $21.95.
- MILLER, WILLIAM LEE. Two Americans: Truman, Eisenhower, and a Dangerous World. (A Borzoi Book.) New York: Alfred A. Knopf. 2012. Pp. vii, 404. $30.00.
- MULRINE, M. BARBARA. The Price of Honor: The Life and Times of George Brinton McClellan Jr. Madison, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press. 2011. Pp. 368. $85.00.
- NATHANSON, MITCHELL. A People's History of Baseball. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press. 2012. Pp. xiv, 275. $29.95.
- NICHOLSON, JAMES C. The Kentucky Derby: How the Run for the Roses Became America's Premier Sporting Event. Foreword by CHRIS MCCARRON. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky. 2012. Pp. xx, 274. $24.95.
- O'ROURKE, WILLIAM. The Harrisburg 7 and the New Catholic Left. Reprint. Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press. 2012. Pp. xviii, 320. $27.00.
- ORSI, ROBERT A., editor. The Cambridge Companion to Religious Studies. (Cambridge Companions to Religion.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 2012. Pp. xiv, 428. Cloth $99.00, paper $29.99.
- PARRISH, TIMOTHY. Ralph Ellison and the Genius of America. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press. 2012. Pp. xiv, 253. Cloth $80.00, paper $26.95.
- PAULY, THOMAS H. Game Faces: Five Early American Champions and the Sports They Changed. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press. 2012. Pp. xix, 243. $25.00.
- PERMAN, MICHAEL. The Southern Political Tradition. (Walter Lynwood Fleming Lectures in Southern History.) Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press. 2012. Pp. x, 116. Cloth $48.00, paper $22.50.
- PERRY, PHYLLIS J. Bold Women in Colorado History. Missoula, Mont.: Mountain Press Publishing Company. 2012. Pp. v, 153. $12.00.
- PHILLIPS-FEIN, KIM, and JULIAN E. ZELIZER, editors. What's Good for Business: Business and American Politics since World War II. New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. xi, 266. $24.95.
- PUTNEY, CLIFFORD, and PAUL T. BURLIN, editors. The Role of the American Board in the World: Bicentennial Reflections on the Organization's Missionary Work, 1810–2010. Eugene, Ore.: Wipf and Stock. 2012. Pp. xxx, 349. $42.00.
- RISSE, GUENTER B. Plague, Fear, and Politics in San Francisco's Chinatown. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press. 2012. Pp. xii, 371. $39.95.
- ROBERTS, ALASDAIR. America's First Great Depression: Economic Crisis and Political Disorder after the Panic of 1837. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press. 2012. Pp. 255. $26.00.
- SANDWEISS, ERIC. The Day in Its Color: Charles Cushman's Photographic Journey through a Vanishing America. New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. 237. $39.95.
- SARVIS, WILL. J. V. Conran and Rural Political Power: Boss Mythology in the Missouri Bootheel. Lanham, Md.: Lexington Books. 2012. Pp. xii, 181. $60.00.
- SCHEITL, CHRISTOPHER P., and ROGER FINKE. Places of Faith: A Road Trip across America's Religious Landscape. New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. x, 254. Cloth $99.00, paper $27.95.
- SCHNEIDER, WILLIAM S. On Time Delivery: The Dog Team Mail

- Carriers*. Fairbanks: University of Alaska Press. 2012. Pp. xvii, 142. $24.95.
- SHELTON, CHRISTINA. Alger Hiss: Why He Chose Treason. Introduction by RICHARD PIPES. New York: Threshold Editions. 2012. Pp. xvii, 330. $26.00.
- SLOAN, BILL. Undefeated: America's Heroic Fight for Bataan and Corregidor. New York: Simon and Schuster. 2012. Pp. 401. $28.00.
- SOLOVEY, MARK, and HAMILTON CRAVENS, editors. Cold War Social Science: Knowledge Production, Liberal Democracy, and Human Nature. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2012. Pp. xv, 270. $90.00.
- STERN, JOHN ALLEN. C. D. Jackson: Cold War Propagandist for Democracy and Globalism. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America. 2012. Pp. xvii, 126. $27.99.
- STEWART, JAMES B. Tangled Webs: How False Statements Are Undermining America; From Martha Stewart to Bernie Madoff. Paperback edition. New York: Penguin. 2012. Pp. xvi, 473. $17.00.
- THORNE, TANIS C. El Capitan: Adaptation and Agency on a Southern California Indian Reservation, 1850 to 1937. Photo essays by HEATHER PONCHETTI DALY. Banning, Calif.: Malki-Bellena Press. 2012. Pp. xii, 236. Cloth $24.95, paper $15.95.
- VAN HORN, ROBERT, PHILIP MIROWSKI, and THOMAS A. STAPLEFORD, editors. Building Chicago Economics: New Perspectives on the History of America's Most Powerful Economics Program. (Historical Perspectives on Modern Economics.) New York: Cambridge University Press. 2011. Pp. lii, 399. $110.00.
- VANDEVELDER, PAUL. Savages and Scoundrels: The Untold Story of America's Road to Empire through Indian Territory. Paperback edition. New Haven: Yale University Press. 2012. Pp. xx, 322. $18.00.
- WAKE, JEHANNE. Sisters of Fortune: America's Caton Sisters at Home and Abroad. Paperback edition. New York: Touchstone. 2012. Pp. xxiv, 393. $16.99.
- WARNER, SAM BASS, and ANDREW H. WHITTEMORE. American Urban Form: A Representative History. Drawings by ANDREW H. WHITTEMORE. (Urban and Industrial Environments.) Cambridge, Mass.: MIT Press. 2012. Pp. 183. $27.95.
- WEINER, GREG. Madison's Metronome: The Constitution, Majority Rule, and the Tempo of American Politics. (American Political Thought.) Lawrence: University Press of Kansas. 2012. Pp. xiii, 194. $29.95.
- WOOD, GREGORY. Retiring Men: Manhood, Labor, and Growing Old in America, 1900–1960. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America. 2012. Pp. xi, 268. $73.00.
- ZARETSKY, ELI. Why America Needs a Left: A Historical Argument. Cambridge: Polity Press. 2012. Pp. 206. $19.95.

CARIBBEAN AND LATIN AMERICA

- HIGMAN, B. W., and KATHLEEN E. A. MONTEITH, editors. West Indian Business History: Enterprise and Entrepreneurship. Kingston, Jamaica: University of the West Indies Press. 2010. Pp. vii, 236. $35.00.
- IPPOLITO-O'DONNELL, GABRIELA. The Right to the City: Popular Contention in Contemporary Buenos Aires. (From the Helen Kellogg Institute for International Studies.) Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press. 2012. Pp. xvi, 288. $38.00.
- MRAZ, JOHN. Photographing the Mexican Revolution: Commitments, Testimonies, Icons. (The William and Bettye Nowlin Series in Art, History, and Culture of the Western Hemisphere.) Austin: University of Texas Press. 2012. Pp. x, 307. $45.00.
- VAN YOUNG, ERIC. Writing Mexican History. Stanford, Calif.:

Stanford University Press. 2012. Pp. x, 338. Cloth $85.00, paper $27.95, e-book $27.95.

EUROPE: ANCIENT AND MEDIEVAL

- BOSE, MISHTOONI, and J. PATRICK HORNBECK II, editors. Wycliffite Controversies. (Medieval Church Studies, number 23.) Turnhout, Belgium: Brepols. 2011. Pp. xiv, 359. €90.00.
- CARDARELLI, SANDRA, EMILY JANE ANDERSON, and JOHN RICHARDS, editors. Art and Identity: Visual Culture, Politics and Religion in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance. Newcastle: Cambridge Scholars Publishing. 2012. Pp. xxxi, 283. $67.99.
- FRANKOPAN, PETER. The First Crusade: The Call from the East. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press. 2012. Pp. xxi, 262. $29.95.
- GOLDHILL, SIMON. Sophocles and the Language of Tragedy. (Onassis Series in Hellenic Culture.) New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. 296. $35.00.
- HEN, YITZHAK. Roman Barbarians: The Royal Court and Culture in the Early Medieval West. (Medieval Culture and Society.) Paperback edition. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. xiii, 213. $30.00.
- HERMAN, GABRIEL, editor. Stability and Crisis in the Athenian Democracy. (Historia Einzelschriften, number 220.) Stuttgart: Franz Steiner Verlag. 2011. Pp. 164. €46.00.
- HÖLKESKAMP, KARL-JOACHIM. Die Entstehung der Nobilität: Studien zur sozialen und politischen Geschichte der Römischen Republik im 4. Jh. V. Chr. (Alte Geschichte.) 2d rev. ed. Stuttgart: Franz Steiner Verlag. 2011. Pp. xxxiii, 344. €47.00.
- HUEY, CAROLINE. Hans Folz and Print Culture in Late Medieval Germany: The Creation of Popular Discourse. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate Publishing Company. 2012. Pp. xvii, 166. $99.95.
- KING, EDMUND. King Stephen. (Yale English Monarchs.) Paperback edition. New Haven: Yale University Press. 2012. Pp. xv, 382. $35.00.
- KOGMAN-APPEL, KATRIN. A Mahzor from Worms: Art and Religion in a Medieval Jewish Community. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 2012. Pp. x, 295. $49.95.
- LATHAM, ANDREW A. Theorizing Medieval Geopolitics: War and World Order in the Age of the Crusades. (Routledge Research in Medieval Studies, number 3.) New York: Routledge. 2012. Pp. 204. $125.00.
- METCALF, WILLIAM E., editor. The Oxford Handbook of Greek and Roman Coinage. (Oxford Handbooks.) New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. xviii, 688. $150.00.
- PETERSEN, LAUREN HACKWORTH, and PATRICIA SALZMAN-MITCHELL, editors. Mothering and Motherhood in Ancient Greece and Rome. Austin: University of Texas Press. 2012. Pp. xii, 260. $55.00.

EUROPE: EARLY MODERN AND MODERN

- BAECHLER, CHRISTIAN. Guerre et exterminations à l'Est: Hitler et la conquête de l'espace vital 1933–1945. Paris: Tallandier. 2012. Pp. 523. €26.90.
- BELLAVITIS, ANNA, and ISABELLE CHABOT, editors. La justice des familles: Autour de la transmission des biens, des savoirs et des pouvoirs (Europe, Nouveau monde, XII^e-XIX^e siècles). (Collection de l'École française de Rome, number 447.) Rome: École française de Rome. 2011. Pp. 505. €65.00.
- BILIARSKY, IVAN, OVIDIU CRISTEA, and ANCA OROVEANU, editors. The Balkans and Caucasus: Parallel Processes on the Opposite Sides of the Black Sea. Newcastle: Cambridge Scholars Publishing. 2012. Pp. ix, 338. $67.99.
- BIRSTEIN, VADIM J. SMERSH: Stalin's Secret Weapon Soviet Military Counterintelligence in WWII. Foreword by NIGEL WEST. London: Biteback Publishing. 2011. Pp. xii, 512. $29.95.

- BOZO, FRÉDÉRIC, et al. Visions of the End of the Cold War in Europe, 1945–1990. (Studies in Contemporary European History, number 11.) New York: Berghahn Books. 2012. Pp. vii, 358. $95.00.
- BRAHAM, RANDOLPH L., and WILLIAM J. VANDEN HEUVEL, editors. The Auschwitz Reports and the Holocaust in Hungary. (East European Monographs, number 785; Holocaust Studies Series.) New York: Rosenthal Institute for Holocaust Studies. Boulder, Colo.: Social Science Monographs, distributed by Columbia University Press. 2011. Pp. xvi, 291. $55.00.
- BUTLER, DANIEL ALLEN. "Unsinkable": The Full Story of RMS Titanic. Rev. ed. Cambridge, Mass.: Da Capo Press. 2012. Pp. xiv, 310. $16.00.
- CAMPT, TINA M. Image Matters: Archive, Photography, and the African Diaspora in Europe. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press. 2012. Pp. xi, 241. Cloth $89.95, paper $24.95.
- CARTER, K. CODELL. The Decline of Therapeutic Bloodletting and the Collapse of Traditional Medicine. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction Publishers. 2012. Pp. ix, 160. $34.95.
- CAU, MAURIZIO, editor. L'Europa di De Gasperi e Adenauer: La sfida della ricostruzione (1945–1951). (Annali dell'Istituto storico italo-germanico in Trento; Quaderni, number 84.) Bologna: Il Mulino. 2011. Pp. 498. €34.00.
- CHAPPEY, JEAN-LUC, et al. Pour quoi faire la Révolution. (Comité de vigilance face aux usages publics de l'histoire.) Marseille: Agone. 2012. Pp. 200. €15.00.
- CITINO, ROBERT M. The Wehrmacht Retreats: Fighting ■ Lost War, 1943. (Modern War Studies.) Lawrence: University Press of Kansas. 2012. Pp. xxviii, 410. $34.95.
- DANE, JOSEPH A. What Is a Book? The Study of Early Printed Books. Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press. 2012. Pp. xv, 276. $30.00.
- DEMPSEY, CHARLES. The Early Renaissance and Vernacular Culture. (The Bernard Berenson Lectures on the Italian Renaissance.) Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 2012. Pp. xii, 384. $39.95.
- DUBNOV, ARIE M. Isaiah Berlin: The Journey of ■ Jewish Liberal. (Palgrave Studies in Cultural and Intellectual History.) New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2012. Pp. xiv, 316. $40.00.
- DUMONS, BRUNO, and HILAIRE MULTON, editors. "Blancs" et contre-révolutionnaires en Europe: Espaces, réseaux, cultures et mémoires (fin XVIII^e–début XX^e siècles; France, Italie, Espagne, Portugal). (Collection de l'École française de Rome, number 454.) Rome: École française de Rome. 2011. Pp. 421. €60.00.
- ELDEM, EDHEM, and SOCRATES PETMEZAS, editors. The Economic Development of Southeastern Europe in the 19th Century. Athens: Alpha Bank Historical Archives. 2011. Pp. 539.
- FANTOLI, ANNIBALE. The Case of Galileo: A Closed Question? Translated by GEORGE V. COYNE, S.J. Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press. 2012. Pp. xii, 271. Paper $28.00, e-book $20.00.
- FISHER, JOHN. British Diplomacy and the Descent into Chaos: The Career of Jack Garnett, 1902–1919. (Britain and the World.) New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2012. Pp. xvii, 280. $85.00.
- GRUNER, WOLF D. Der Deutsche Bund 1815–1866. (C.H. Beck Wissen.) München: Verlag C. H. Beck. 2012. Pp. 127. €8.95.
- HÄBERLEIN, MARK. The Fuggers of Augsburg: Pursuing Wealth and Honor in Renaissance Germany. (Studies in Early Modern German History.) Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press. 2012. Pp. ix, 286. Cloth $39.50, e-book $39.50.
- HÜSER, DIETMAR, and JEAN-FRANÇOIS ECK, editors. Medien-Debatten-Öffentlichkeiten in Deutschland und Frankreich im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert/Médias, débats et espaces publics en Allemagne et en France aux 19^e et 20^e siècles. (Schriftenreihe des Deutsch-Französischen Historikerkomitees, number 7.) Stuttgart: Franz Steiner Verlag. 2011. Pp. 320. €52.00.
- HAGEN, WILLIAM W. German History in Modern Times: Four Lives of the Nation. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2012. Pp. xviii, 463. Cloth $99.00, paper $28.99.
- HERNÁN, ENRIQUE GARCÍA, and MARÍA DEL PILAR RYAN, editors. Francisco de Borja y su Tiempo: Política, Religión y Cultura en la Edad Moderna. (Bibliotheca Instituti Historici Societatis Iesu, number 74.) Valencia: Albatros Ediciones. Rome: Bibliotheca Instituti Historici Societatis Iesu. 2011. Pp. xiv, 800.
- ILLY, JÓZSEF. The Practical Einstein: Experiments, Patents, Inventions. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press. 2012. Pp. xi, 202. $60.00.
- JAMES, FELICITY, and IAN INKSTER, editors. Religious Dissent and the Aikin-Barbould Circle, 1740–1860. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2012. Pp. xiii, 257. $95.00.
- JAMES, HAROLD. Krupp: A History of the Legendary German Firm. Princeton: Princeton University Press. 2012. Pp. 360. $35.00.
- JAMES, T. G. H. Howard Carter: The Path to Tutankhamun. Reprint. London: Tauris Parke. 2008. Pp. xiv, 513. $23.00.
- KOSKINEN, ULLA. Hyvien miesten valtakunta: Arvid Henrikipoika Tawast ja aatelin toimintakulttuuri 1500-luvun lopun Suomeissa [A Kingdom of Good Men: Arvid Henriksson Tawast and the Culture of Agency among Noblemen in Late Sixteenth-Century Finland]. (Bibliotheca Historica, number 132.) Helsinki: Suomalaisen Kirjallisuuden Seura. 2011. Pp. 446. €38.00.
- KUSHNER, TONY. Anglo-Jewry since 1066: Place, Locality, and Memory. Paperback edition. New York: Manchester University Press. 2011. Pp. ix, 274. $30.95.
- LEADER, ANNE. The Badia of Florence: Art and Observance in a Renaissance Monastery. Bloomington: Indiana University Press. 2012. Pp. x, 325. $65.00.
- LIBERLES, ROBERT. Jews Welcome Coffee: Tradition and Innovation in Early Modern Germany. (Tauber Institute Series for the Study of European Jewry.) Waltham, Mass.: Brandeis University Press. 2012. Pp. xviii, 169. Cloth $85.00, paper $35.00, e-book $29.99.
- LUHRSEN, DAVID. Hammer of the Gods: The Thule Society and the Birth of Nazism. Dulles, Va.: Potomac Books, Inc. 2012. Pp. xxi, 293. $35.00.
- MACKENZIE, JOHN M., and T. M. DEVINE, editors. Scotland and the British Empire. (The Oxford History of the British Empire Companion Series.) New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. xiii, 323. $65.00.
- MERTEN, ULRICH. Forgotten Voices: The Expulsion of the Germans from Eastern Europe after World War II. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction Publishers. 2012. Pp. xx, 336. $44.95.
- MEYER, JESSICA. Men of War: Masculinity and the First World War in Britain. (Genders and Sexualities in History.) Paperback edition. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2011. Pp. xi, 216. $32.00.
- MILLER, GREGORY D. The Shadow of the Past: Reputation and Military Alliances before the First World War. (Cornell Studies in Security Affairs.) Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press. 2012. Pp. xii, 234. $45.00.
- NOFLATSCHER, HEINZ, MICHAEL A. CHISHOLM, and BERTRAND SCHNERB, editors. Maximilian I. (1459–1519): Wahrnehmung-Übersetzungen-Gender. Assisted by DANIELA UNTERHOLZNER and SILVIA ERBER. (Innsbrucker Historische Studien, number 27.) Innsbruck, Austria: Studienverlag. 2011. Pp. 472. €59.00.
- NORKUS, ZENONAS. On Baltic Slovenia and Adriatic Lithuania: A Qualitative Comparative Analysis of Patterns in Post-Communist Transformations. Vilnius, Lithuania: Apostrofa, distributed by Central European University Press. 2012. Pp. 375. $60.00.

- Ó HAODHA, MÍCHEÁL. "Insubordinate Irish": Travellers in the Text. New York: Manchester University Press. 2011. Pp. x, 228. $95.00.
- PARRY, GLYN. The Arch-Conjuror of England: John Dee. New Haven: Yale University Press. 2011. Pp. xii, 335. $55.00.
- PAST, ELENA. Methods of Murder: Beccarian Introspection and Lombrosian Vivisection in Italian Crime Fiction. (Toronto Italian Studies.) Buffalo, N.Y.: University of Toronto Press. 2012. Pp. x, 353. $75.00.
- PEZZINO, PAOLO. Memory and Massacre: Revisiting Sant'Anna di Stazzema. Translated by NOOR GIOVANNI MAZHAR. (Italian and Italian American Studies.) New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2012. Pp. xx, 189. $80.00.
- RABINOVICI, DORON. Eichmann's Jews: The Jewish Administration of Holocaust Vienna, 1938–1945. Translated by NICK SOMERS. Cambridge: Polity Press. 2011. Pp. x, 260. $25.00.
- RAMPLEY, MATTHEW, editor. Heritage, Ideology, and Identity in Central and Eastern Europe: Contested Pasts, Contested Presents. (Heritage Matters, number 6.) Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell Press. 2012. Pp. viii, 206. $95.00.
- REITTER, PAUL. On the Origins of Jewish Self-Hatred. Princeton: Princeton University Press. 2012. Pp. 166. $26.95.
- ROGERS, PAT. Documenting Eighteenth Century Satire: Pope, Swift, Gay, and Arbuthnot in Historical Context. Newcastle: Cambridge Scholars Publishing. 2012. Pp. xii, 310. $67.99.
- SKIRBEKK, GUNNAR. Multiple Modernities: A Tale of Scandinavian Experiences. Hong Kong: Chinese University Press. 2011. Pp. 221. $45.00.
- SOULIÉ, CHARLES, editor. Un mythe à détruire? Origines et destin du Centre universitaire expérimental de Vincennes. Saint-Denis, France: Presses Universitaires de Vincennes. 2012. Pp. 482. €29.00.
- STAHEL, DAVID. Kiev 1941: Hitler's Battle for Supremacy in the East. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2012. Pp. xvi, 468. $35.00.
- STANZIANI, ALESSANDRO. Rules of Exchange: French Capitalism in Comparative Perspective, Eighteenth to Early Twentieth Centuries. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2012. Pp. ix, 313. $90.00.
- STRING, TATIANA C., and MARCUS BULL, editors. Tudorism: Historical Imagination and the Appropriation of the Sixteenth Century. (Proceedings of the British Academy, number 170.) London: The British Academy. New York: Oxford University Press. 2011. Pp. xiv, 286. $135.00.
- SVENSON, SALLY E. Lily, Duchess of Marlborough (1854–1909): A Portrait with Husbands. Indianapolis: Dog Ear Publishing. 2012. Pp. xi, 305. $18.95.
- THOMPSON, ANDREW, editor. Britain's Experience of Empire in the Twentieth Century. (The Oxford History of the British Empire Companion Series.) New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. xii, 356. $65.00.
- TOBIN, ROBERT. The Minority Voice: Hubert Butler and Southern Irish Protestantism, 1900–1991. (Oxford Historical Monographs.) New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. vi, 302. $125.00.
- TORREY, GLENN E. The Romanian Battlefield in World War I. (Modern War Studies.) Lawrence: University Press of Kansas. 2011. Pp. xvi, 422. $39.95.
- VAN GINDERACHTER, MAARTEN, and MARNIX BEYEN, editors. Nationhood from Below: Europe in the Long Nineteenth Century. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2012. Pp. xi, 267. $85.00.
- WALKER, STEPHEN. Hide and Seek: The Irish Priest in the Vatican Who Defied the Nazi Command. Guilford, Conn.: Lyons Press. 2011. Pp. ix, 342. $24.95.
- WARNICKE, RETHA M. Wicked Women of Tudor England: Queens, Aristocrats, Commoners. (Queenship and Power.) New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2012. Pp. x, 272. Cloth $90.00, paper $27.00.
- WELSHMAN, JOHN. Titanic: The Last Night of a Small Town. New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. xxii, 324. $29.95.
- WHALEY, JOACHIM. Germany and the Holy Roman Empire: Volume 1, From Maximilian I to the Peace of Westphalia 1493–1648. (Oxford History of Early Modern Europe.) New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. xiv, 722. $160.00.
- WHALEY, JOACHIM. Germany and the Holy Roman Empire: Volume 2, From the Peace of Westphalia to the Dissolution of the Reich 1648–1806. (Oxford History of Early Modern Europe.) New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. xxiv, 747. $160.00.

MIDDLE EAST AND NORTHERN AFRICA

- BUGGENHAGEN, BETH. Muslim Families in Global Senegal: Money Takes Care of Shame. Bloomington: Indiana University Press. 2012. Pp. x, 242. Cloth $70.00, paper $24.95, e-book $20.99.
- CLINE, ERIC H., and DAVID O'CONNOR, editors. Rameses III: The Life and Times of Egypt's Last Hero. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press. 2012. Pp. xvi, 542. $90.00.
- DARYAEE, TOURAJ, editor. The Oxford Handbook of Iranian History. (Oxford Handbooks.) New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. xiii, 414. $150.00.
- FERAOUN, MOULOUD. Land and Blood. Translated by PATRICIA GEESEY. (CARAF Books.) Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press. 2012. Pp. ix, 243. Cloth $59.50, paper $22.50.
- KURU, AHMET T., and ALFRED STEPAN, editors. Democracy, Islam, and Secularism in Turkey. (Religion, Culture, and Public Life.) New York: Columbia University Press. 2012. Pp. vi, 216. Cloth $84.50, paper $27.50, e-book $21.99.
- SASSOON, JOSEPH. Saddam Hussein's Ba'ath Party: Inside an Authoritarian Regime. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2012. Pp. xxi, 314. Cloth $95.00, paper $27.99.
- WILKINSON, RICHARD H., editor. Tausret: Forgotten Queen and Pharaoh of Egypt. New York: Oxford University Press. 2012. Pp. xii, 145. $35.00.

SUB-SAHARAN AFRICA

- FIELD, SEAN. Oral History, Community, and Displacement: Imagining Memories in Post-Apartheid South Africa. (Palgrave Studies in Oral History.) New York: Palgrave Macmillan. 2012. Pp. xvi, 221. $85.00.
- LOVEJOY, PAUL E. Transformations in Slavery: A History of Slavery in Africa. (African Studies, number 117.) 3d ed. New York: Cambridge University Press. 2012. Pp. xxiv, 381. Cloth $99.00, paper $31.99.
- PEARSON, ANDREW, et al. Infernal Traffic: Excavation of a Liberated African Graveyard in Rupert's Valley, St Helena. (CBA Research Report, number 169.) York: Council for British Archaeology. 2011. Pp. xxii, 178. £30.00.
- WHITEHOUSE, BRUCE. Migrants and Strangers in an African City: Exile, Dignity, and Belonging. Bloomington: Indiana University Press. 2012. Pp. x, 274. Cloth $70.00, paper $25.00, e-book $21.99.

A letter to the editor will be considered only if it relates to an article or review published in this journal; publication is solely at the editors' discretion. The AHA disclaims responsibility for statements, of either fact or opinion, made by the writers. Letters should not exceed 1,000 words. They can be submitted by e-mail to ahr@indiana.edu, or by the postal service to Editor, American Historical Review, 914 E. Atwater Ave., Bloomington, IN 47401. For detailed information on the policies for this section, see <http://www.americanhistoricalreview.org>.

REVIEWS

TO THE EDITORS:

I would like to thank Donald R. Kelley for his generous review of History and Its Limits: Human, Animal, Violence (AHR, February 2012, 161–162). I would, however, like to respond to a few assertions. I do not agree with the characterization of me as a religious thinker or the notion that I attribute to intellectual history a “quasi-religious mission.” I would, however, agree that I try to give both historiography and the subdiscipline of intellectual history a critical-theoretical dimension as well as a quasi-utopian or transformative impetus. I also try to be open-minded but not uncritical with respect to important aspects of the recent “postsecular” turn in various theoretical approaches.

In the quotation from page 50 of my book that stipulates what “the problem” is for me, a colon is omitted after “world” and before “self-presentation,” which leads to a garbled sentence: “all that goes into the making of a significant, if problematic, world self-presentation, justification, prejudice, fantasy, and affect as well as experience that is not reducible to immaculate perception.” I criticize “Practice Theory” not so much for its “documentary” leanings as for the way it tends to downplay these factors, which have an important role in ideology.

“Traumatropism” is not my technical term but a term that can be found in many dictionaries. It refers to a mutation in a plant subjected to a severe wound. I use the term metaphorically to refer to the “transfiguration” of trauma into the sacred or the sublime—a process I do not advocate but manifestly treat in a critical manner. Hence it is not accurate to attribute to me that which I analyze critically in the work of others. (“For LaCapra trauma resides in the sacred and is something like a negative sublime.”) On a related note, I do not on my own behalf present or endorse—but instead critically analyze—appeals to violence as an antidote to a “debased sociopolitical and cultural system” or as (what Kelley terms) “the positive side of terrorism.” Nor do I refer to “the shoes on Picasso’s peasant woman in Guernica.” With respect to Guernica (and the role in it of “an anguished, petrified open mouth”), I refer to “the open mouth of the corresponding figures, including the horse” in Picasso’s famous painting (p. 69). I discuss the shoes of a putative peasant woman with reference to Heidegger’s discussion (in “The Origin of the Work of Art”) of Van Gogh’s painting, and I do so in good part critically, even alluding to Heidegger’s “lyrical, mythologized, and somewhat kitsch evocation of the little old peasant lady who lived in her shoe” (p. 142). A key issue I explore is how to analyze the relation between the two registers in Heidegger that Kelley alludes to but does not explicitly name: the thought-provoking, at times poetic or even postsecular register and the dangerous, dubious register resonating with Nazi ideology.

Finally, Kelley’s account includes one truly uncanny elision. With respect to my “rather serious deconversion experience,” I refer to something Kelley does not mention: an event in my early life wherein “religious language, in its intimate relation to religious experience, had broken down or fallen apart into fragments or nonsense syllables that could not be fitted together meaningfully” (p. 205). In marked contrast, I refer to what Kelley substitutes for the latter (to wit, my father’s question about whether the alternative to intellectual history is “dumb” history) as “my parodic founding trauma—a joke of sorts” (p. 206). And, in case the parody and irony in both my father’s question and my presentation of it might be missed, I state explicitly that “the point, however, is not that all history is either intellectual history or dumb history.” Instead, a point I stress is that “all history should have a self-reflexive and critical theoretical component—indeed a gadfly element—in which the very questions and concepts employed are themselves interrogated, disciplinary limits are subjected to scrutiny, and room is made for the issue of the relation between inquiry into the past and its implications for the present and future” (p. 207).

DOMINICK LACAPRA
Cornell University

Donald R. Kelley does not wish to respond.

TO THE EDITORS:

Colin Newbury's review of my book Intimate Strangers (AHR, February 2012, 185–186) contains a number of specific errors, which may have the unfortunate effect of misrepresenting the book's project to AHR readers. Newbury writes: "From the outset, Smith concentrates on the epistemological significance of the term taio (friend), which was used by islanders to greet visitors . . . Smith does so without exploring its cognates as recorded in the 1830s by John Davies in his Tahitian and English Dictionary (1851). Davies explained the relationship between the words tau'a and hoa and the consolidation of missionary power." Davies's 1851 dictionary in fact offers no explanation of the relationship between the three terms: it simply records them as synonymous. But even had it been an important source for such an exploration, my book's historical framework, as clearly stated on page 2, is the "forty years of early European-Oceanic encounter" from 1767 to 1806. This early contact period has its own political texture, distinct from that of the mid-nineteenth-century era of missionary imperialism that Newbury references here. It is integral to the book's project that it maintains an awareness of the peculiar characteristics of imperialism in that period, rather than conflating these with the later missionary/settler politics exemplified by either the field observations or the writings of the Pacific missionary Davies.

As Intimate Strangers demonstrates, there are good reasons for keeping a consideration of taio distinct from one of hoa and tau'a. The book seeks to address the fact that during the first forty years of significant contact, taio—a word whose complexity, for Europeans, went well beyond simple translations as "friend" or "greeting"—was the most recurrent and interrogated Polynesian word to appear in European sources, and it also seeks to explain its subsequent, equally surprising, disappearance. As I write on page 69, "Alternative Tahitian friendship terms hoa and tau'a rarely figure in the same way in these early accounts." I am nonetheless careful to distinguish taio from these later dominant concepts, using ethnohistories that draw on Tahitian oral evidence, as well as archival sources (for example, pp. 63–70). Given the changing implications of the word over more than eighty years of Pacific history, to emphasize mid-nineteenth-century evidence of cognate friendship terms in constructing my account of the politics of late-eighteenth-century taio would not only have been inaccurate, it would have implied an understanding of both cultural practice and the politics of Empire as unduly monolithic. Instead the book argues for the specific and precarious significance the term achieved during the first forty years of sustained contact, precisely because this provides a lens through which to view the investment of both Europeans and Polynesians in modes of exchange and discourses of friendship that became unfeasible during later periods of missionary and settler imperialism.

VANESSA SMITH
University of Sydney

COLIN NEWBURY RESPONDS:

I stand by my statement that Vanessa Smith does not explore the cognates of taio ("friend"). True, I should not have implied that Davies explained the terms hoa and tau'a in his Dictionary of 1851. But he certainly does so in correspondence and in his work as a translator over the previous half-century. The point is important, because the cognate terms taio and tau'a have quite distinct denotations from the common reference to casual acquaintances and trading partners. Moreover, they were commented on early in the period of European contact. During Cook's second visit, 1773–1774, John Reinhold Forster noted that hoa was used for client chiefs. James Morrison, too, in 1789, made a similar distinction based on the status of such "friends." (Detailed references can be found in my article "Pacts, Alliances and Patronage: Modes of Influence and Power in the Pacific," Journal of Pacific History 44, no. 2 [2009]: 141–162. See, too, Douglas Oliver, Oceania: The Native Cultures of Australia and the Pacific Islands, 2 vols. [Honolulu, 1989], 2: 924.) Tau'a referring to the associate and acolyte of a god is more specialized in its status denotation of priests; it is rare in the sources and disappears during the religious and secular power struggles of the first decade of the nineteenth century. As, indeed, does taio, because from about 1807, hoa appears in Tahitian correspondence with missionaries and with captains of vessels sent by Governor King, denoting useful clients of higher status than beach traders. It was specifically used, for example, by Pomare II in an appeal to the London Missionary Society for material support. A further point worth considering is that the Tahitian language itself was in the course of considerable modification over the period, including the elimination of terms associated with earlier beliefs and practices.

I stick to my view, therefore, that it would have been important to extend the time frame of the chronology by about a decade to take into account these status changes in Tahitians' perceptions of European visitors and missionary settlers. The "lens" of a single term used for "friends" in the early period of contact gives too narrow a focus to help explain the complex cultural and political interactions of Tahitians and Europeans as "Intimate Strangers." I see no evidence that this "intimacy" led, moreover, to British settler or missionary "imperialism," but, ironically, to the very real imperialism of France in 1842.

COLIN NEWBURY
Linacre College, Oxford

ERRATUM

In Matthew Butler's review of Jason Dormady, Primitive Revolution: Restorationist Religion and the Idea of the Mexican Revolution, 1940–1968 (AHR, April 2012, 579), Luis Cabrera was mistakenly referred to as Miguel Cabrera. The editors regret the error.

Index to American Historical Review, June 2012

The titles of articles in the AHR are enclosed in quotation marks, and titles of books reviewed are printed in italics. Books of collected essays are designated by (E). The reviewer of a book or film is designated by (R), the author of a letter for the Communications section by (C).

Abi-Mershed, Osama W. (R), 975
Adler, Eric, Valorizing the Barbarians: Enemy Speeches in Roman Historiography, 910
African American History Reconsidered, by Dagbovie, 820
After Ruskin, by Eagles, 934
After the Dream, by Minchin and Salmond, 886
After the Event, by Feuchtwang, 829
Ahmedabad, by Spodek, 839
Aksakal, Mustafa (R), 975
Alaska's Place in the West, by Willis, 859
Alberti, Samuel J. M. M., Morbid Curiosities: Medical Museums in Nineteenth-Century Britain, 932
Alderman, Geoffrey (R), 931
Alexander, Jennifer Karns (R), 826
Alpert, Rebecca T., Out of Left Field: Jews and Black Baseball, 870 Alternatives to Appeasement, by Stedman, 938
The American Civil War in the Shaping of British Democracy, by Kinser, 930
American Patriotism, American Protest, by Hall, 887
America's Army, by Bailey, 897
Ancestral Memory in Early China, by Brashier, 832
"Another Set of Imperial Turns?" by Ghosh, 772
App, Urs, The Birth of Orientalism, 918
Arabs of the Jewish Faith, by Schreier, 975
Archer, John E., The Monster Evil: Policing and Violence in Victorian Liverpool, 929
Armstrong, Julie Buckner, Mary Turner and the Memory of Lynching, 866
Atrocity and American Military Justice in Southeast Asia, by Barnett, 895
Auerbach, Jeffrey A. (R), 919

Bachelors and Bunnies, by Pitzulo, 880
Back to the Land, by Brown, 857
Baer, Friederike (R), 845
Bailey, Beth, America's Army: Making the All-Volunteer Force, 897
Bailey, Richard A. (R), 843
Balcom, Karen A., The Traffic in Babies: Cross-Border

Adoption and Baby-Selling between the United States and Canada, 1930–1972, 840
Barber, David (R), 888
Bar-Kochva, Bezalel, The Image of the Jews in Greek Literature: The Hellenistic Period, 908
Barnett, Louise, Atrocity and American Military Justice in Southeast Asia: Trial by Army, 895
Bass, Amy (R), 870
Bates, A. W. (R), 932
Belzer, Allison Scardino, Women and the Great War: Femininity under Fire in Italy, 955
The Benderly Boys and American Jewish Education, by Krasner, 889
Benton, Lauren, A Search for Sovereignty: Law and Geography in European Empires, 1400–1900, 814
Between National Socialism and Soviet Communism, by Holian, 950
Beyen, Marnix, and Maarten Van Ginderachter, editors, Nationhood from Below: Europe in the Long Nineteenth Century (E), 979
Biography of an Empire, by Philliou, 973
The Birth of Orientalism, by App, 918
Black, Jeremy, Fighting for America: The Struggle for Mastery in North America, 1519–1871, 824
Black Political Activism and the Cuban Republic, by Pappademos, 904
Blair, Cynthia M., I've Got to Make My Livin': Black Women's Sex Work in Turn-of-the-Century Chicago, 860
Blaive, Muriel (R), 960
Boisseau, Tracey Jean, and Tracy A. Thomas, editors, Feminist Legal History: Essays on Women and Law, 867
Bokovoy, Melissa (R), 961
The Bolivian Revolution and the United States, 1952 to the Present, by Siekmeier, 831
Bonastia, Christopher (R), 882
Botsman, Daniel (R), 835
Boyar, Ebru (R), 973
Bradley, Stefan M. (R), 885
Brashier, K. E., Ancestral Memory in Early China, 832
Bren, Paulina, The Greengrocer and His TV: The Culture of Communism after the 1968 Prague Spring, 960
Britain and the Islamic World, 1558–1713, by MacLean and Matar, 924
Britain, Ireland, and Continental Europe in the Eighteenth Century, by Conway, 926
Brower, M. Brady, Unruly Spirits: The Science of Psychic Phenomena in Modern France, 943
Brown, Dona, Back to the Land: The Enduring Dream of Self-Sufficiency in Modern America, 857
Buckner, Timothy R., and Peter Caster, editors, Fathers, Preachers, Rebels, Men: Black Masculinity in U.S. History and Literature, 1820–1945, 868

- The Burgher and the Whore*, by van de Pol, 946
 Burkee, James C., Power, Politics, and the Missouri Synod: A Conflict That Changed American Christianity, 891
 Burns, Jennifer (R), 902
 Burns, William E. (R), 923
 Butler, Leslie (R), 851
 Buttay, Florence, and Axelle Guillausseau, editors, Des saints d'État? Politique et sainteté au temps du concile de Trente (E), 978
 Butters, Gerald R., Jr. (R), 868
- The Cairo Conference of 1943*, by Heiferman, 829
 Calder, Norman, Islamic Jurisprudence in the Classical Era, 971
 Canales, Jimena, A Tenth of a Second: A History, 825
 Cannon, Brian Q. (R), 857
Capitalizing on Crisis, by Krippner, 898
Captives of Revolution, by Smith, 967
 Carew, Michael G. (R), 873
 Carlebach, Elisheva, Palaces of Time: Jewish Calendar and Culture in Early Modern Europe, 915
 Case, Holly (R), 962
 Caster, Peter, and Timothy R. Buckner, editors, Fathers, Preachers, Rebels, Men: Black Masculinity in U.S. History and Literature, 1820–1945, 868
 Chambers, Lori (R), 841
 Chaplin, Jane D. (R), 910
 Chatterjee, Nandini (R), 837
Cities in Battlefields, edited by Goebel and Keene, 828
Civilizing Habits, by Curtis, 942
 Clark, Elizabeth A., Founding the Fathers: Early Church History and Protestant Professors in Nineteenth-Century America, 843
 Clark, J. C. D. (R), 926
 Cloyd, Benjamin (R), 849
 Cohen, Shaye J. D. (R), 908
Coins, Trade, and the State, by Segal, 834 Colonization and Its Discontents, by Tomek, 845
 Comerford, R. V. (R), 938
Confluence, by Pritchard, 945
Connecticut in the American Civil War, by Warshauer, 849
 Conway, Stephen, Britain, Ireland, and Continental Europe in the Eighteenth Century: Similarities, Connections, Identities, 926
 Cook, James W., "The Kids Are All Right: On the 'Turning' of Cultural History," 746
 Cordery, Simon (R), 928
Cowboy Conservatism, by Cunningham, 893
 Crane, Susan A. (R), 947
Creating Medieval Cairo, by Sanders, 974
Creating Wine, by Simpson, 824
 Crocker, Ruth, Mrs. Russell Sage: Women's Activism and Philanthropy in Gilded Age and Progressive Era America, 860
 Crocker, Ruth (R), 863
Cultural Region, by Vall, 939
 Cunningham, Sean P., Cowboy Conservatism: Texas and the Rise of the Modern Right, 893
 Cunningham, Sean P. (R), 892
 Curta, Florin, The Edinburgh History of the Greeks, c. 500 to 1050: The Early Middle Ages, 912
- Curtis, Sarah A., Civilizing Habits: Women Missionaries and the Revival of French Empire, 942
 Curwood, Anastasia C., Stormy Weather: Middle-Class African American Marriages between the Two World Wars, 869
- Daddis, Gregory A., No Sure Victory: Measuring U.S. Army Effectiveness and Progress in the Vietnam War, 894
 Dagbovie, Pero Gaglo, African American History Reconsidered, 820
Dance of the Furies, by Neiberg, 920
 Davies, Wendy, and Paul Fouracre, editors, The Languages of Gift in the Early Middle Ages, 914
 Dawson, Sandra Trudgen, Holiday Camps in Twentieth-Century Britain: Packaging Pleasure, 937
 Day, Mark (R), 819
 de Bruyn Kops-Rahusen, Henriette (R), 824
Defending National Treasures, by Karlsgodt, 944
 Dehne, Phillip, On the Far Western Front: Britain's First World War in South America, 904
 Dennison, Tracy, The Institutional Framework of Russian Serfdom, 966
Desert Visions and the Making of Phoenix, 1860–2009, by VanderMeer, 856
Deviant and Useful Citizens, by Meléndez, 905
 Dew, Nicholas (R), 918
 Dewey, Scott Hamilton (R), 895
 Diner, Hasia R. (R), 889
 Dirlik, Arif (R), 821
 Dobie, Madeleine, Trading Places: Colonization and Slavery in Eighteenth-Century French Culture, 940
Doctored, by Sheehan, 861
 Dorsey, Jennifer Hull, Hirelings: African American Workers and Free Labor in Early Maryland, 846
 Drake, James D. (R), 824
Dressing Up, by Rublack, 917
Dropping the Torch, by Sarantakes, 900
Dueling Students, by Zwicker, 948
 Dunak, Karen (R), 869
 Dunstan, Helen (R), 833
 Dweck, Yaacob, The Scandal of Kabbalah: Leon Modena, Jewish Mysticism, Early Modern Venice, 953
- Eagles, Stuart, After Ruskin: The Social and Political Legacies of a Victorian Prophet, 1870–1920, 934
The Edinburgh History of the Greeks, c. 500 to 1050, by Curta, 912
 Eisenstadt, Peter, Rochdale Village: Robert Moses, 6,000 Families, and New York City's Great Experiment in Integrated Housing, 882
 El-Hibri, Tayeb, Parable and Politics in Early Islamic History: The Rashidun Caliphs, 971
Ending British Rule in Africa, by Polsgrove, 976 Engineering Nature, by Teisch, 826
 Ericson, David F. (R), 847
European Transformations, edited by Noble and Van Engen (E), 977
- Faith and Fatherland*, by Porter-Szűcs, 957 Families and States in Western Europe, edited by Skinner, 922

- Farrell, Sean (R), 927
Fathers, Preachers, Rebels, Men, edited by Buckner and Caster, 868
Feminist Legal History, edited by Thomas and Boisseau, 867
Fenians and Ribbonmen, by McCluskey, 938
Feuchtwang, Stephan, After the Event: The Transmission of Grievous Loss in Germany, China, and Taiwan, 829
Fewster, Joseph M., The Keelmen of Tyneside: Labour Organisation and Conflict in the North-East Coal Industry, 1600–1830, 928
Fidelis, Malgorzata, Women, Communism, and Industrialization in Postwar Poland, 959
Field, Alexander J., A Great Leap Forward: 1930s Depression and U.S. Economic Growth, 872 Fighting for America, by Black, 824
The Final Battle, by Stephenson, 949
Finkelman, Paul, and Donald R. Kennon, editors, In the Shadow of Freedom: The Politics of Slavery in the National Capital, 847
Fisher, Michael H. (R), 924
Fleeting Cities, by Geppert, 919
Foley, Michael S. (R), 897
Foreman, Amanda, A World on Fire: Britain's Crucial Role in the American Civil War, 816
Fostering Nation? Canada Confronts Its History of Childhood Disadvantage, by Strong-Boag, 841
Foulkes, Julia L. (R), 886
Founding the Fathers, by Clark, 843
Fouracre, Paul, and Wendy Davies, editors, The Languages of Gift in the Early Middle Ages, 914
Frakes, Robert M. (R), 911
Frank, Andrew K., and Kenneth Osgood, editors, Selling War in a Media Age: The Presidency and Public Opinion in the American Century, 875
Frazier, Lessie Jo, Salt in the Sand: Memory, Violence, and the Nation-State in Chile, 1890 to the Present, 907
Frederickson, Mary E., Looking South: Race, Gender, and the Transformation of Labor from Reconstruction to Globalization, 853
The Freedman in the Roman World, by Mouritsen, 909
The French Colonial Mind, edited by Thomas (E), 979
Frick, Carole Collier (R), 917
Friedman, Andrea (R), 883
Friedman, Max Paul (R), 830
From History to Theory, by Klein, 819
"From Optic to Topic," by Wilder, 723
- Gardner, Kirsten E. (R), 865
Gary, the Most American of All American Cities, by O'Hara, 855
"Generational Turns," by Perl-Rosenthal, 804
Geppert, Alexander C. T., Fleeting Cities: Imperial Expositions in Fin-de-Siècle Europe, 919
Ghosh, Durba, "Another Set of Imperial Turns?" 772
Gillis, John R. (R), 925
Giloi, Eva, Monarchy, Myth, and Material Culture in Germany 1750–1950, 947
Global Dawn, by Ninkovich, 851
Global Migrants, Local Culture, by Tabili, 935
Global Perspectives on Global History, by Sachsenmaier, 821
Göçek, Fatma Müge, The Transformation of Turkey: Redefining State and Society from the Ottoman Empire to the Modern Era, 975
God's Own Party, by Williams, 892
Goebel, Stefan, and Derek Keene, editors, Cities in Battlefields: Metropolitan Scenarios, Experiences, and Commemorations of Total War, 828
Goldberg, Eric J. (R), 913
Goossen, Rachel Waltner (R), 874
Gordon, Wendy M. (R), 935
Gore, Dayo F., Radicalism at the Crossroads: African American Women Activists in the Cold War, 883
A Great Leap Forward, by Field, 872
Grebbe, Emily, Sarajevo, 1941–1945: Muslims, Christians, and Jews in Hitler's Europe, 962
The Greengrocer and His TV, by Bren, 960
Green-Lewis, Jennifer (R), 861
Gregory, Adrian (R), 920
Griffiths, Clare V. J. (R), 921
Guillausseau, Axelle, and Florence Buttay, editors, Des saints d'État? Politique et sainteté au temps du concile de Trente (E), 978
Guttmann, Allen (R), 900
- Haldon, John (R), 972
Hale, Grace Elizabeth, A Nation of Outsiders: How the White Middle Class Fell in Love with Rebellion in Postwar America, 879
Hall, Gwendolyn Midlo (R), 904
Hall, Simon, American Patriotism, American Protest: Social Movements since the Sixties, 887
Hammond, John Craig (R), 846
Hanson, Paul R. (R), 941
Harbutt, Fraser J. (R), 829
Harper, Kyle (R), 909
Harper, Steven C. (R), 850
Harvey, Mark (R), 859
Hatton, Erin, The Temp Economy: From Kelly Girls to Permatemps in Postwar America, 881
Heidegger in America, by Woessner, 879
Heiferman, Ronald Ian, The Cairo Conference of 1943: Roosevelt, Churchill, Chiang Kai-shek, and Madame Chiang, 829
Helping Humanity, by Pomakoy, 903
Hill, Rebecca (R), 866
Hinterland Dreams, by Morser, 854
Hirelings, by Dorsey, 846
Hmong America, by Vang, 896
Hoch, Steven L. (R), 966
Hoffert, Sylvia D. (R), 860
Hoffius, Stephen G., and Susan Millar Williams, Upheaval in Charleston: Earthquake and Murder on the Eve of Jim Crow, 853
Holian, Anna, Between National Socialism and Soviet Communism: Displaced Persons in Postwar Germany, 950
Holiday Camps in Twentieth-Century Britain, by Dawson, 937
Holland, David F., Sacred Borders: Continuing Revelation and Canonical Restraint in Early America, 843
Holquist, Peter (R), 967
Horn, Martin (R), 904
Horne, John (R), 827
Horvath-Peterson, Sandra (R), 942
How Cancer Crossed the Color Line, by Wailoo, 865

- Human Rights Activism and the End of the Cold War*, by Snyder, 830
- Hung, Ho-Fung, Protest with Chinese Characteristics: Demonstrations, Riots, and Petitions in the Mid-Qing Dynasty, 833
- Hunt, Peter, War, Peace, and Alliance in Demosthenes' Athens, 907
- The Image of the Jews in Greek Literature*, by Bar-Kochva, 908
- Immanuel Wallerstein and the Problem of the World, edited by Palumbo-Liu, Robbins, and Tanoukhi, 822
- Imprisoned in a Luminous Glare*, by Raiford, 886
- In the Shadow of Freedom*, edited by Finkelman and Kennon, 847
- In the Wake of the Great Rebellion*, by Patterson, 927
- India in the Shadows of Empire*, by Mukherjee, 837
- The Institutional Framework of Russian Serfdom*, by Dennison, 966
- "The International Politics of Vaccine Testing in Interwar Algiers," by Rosenberg, 671
- The Invention of Ecocide*, by Zierler, 895
- Islamic Jurisprudence in the Classical Era*, by Calder, 971
- I've Got to Make My Livin'*, by Blair, 860
- IzziDien, Mawil (R), 971
- The Joaquín Band*, by Wilson, 848
- Johnson, Sam, Pogroms, Peasants, Jews: Britain and Eastern Europe's "Jewish Question," 1867–1925, 931
- Johnston, Warren, Revelation Restored: The Apocalypse in Later Seventeenth-Century England, 923
- Justice, Benjamin (R), 843
- Justice in Lüritz*, by Markovits, 952
- Kaegi, Walter E., Muslim Expansion and Byzantine Collapse in North Africa, 972
- Kaegi, Walter E. (R), 912
- Karlsgodt, Elizabeth Campbell, Defending National Treasures: French Art and Heritage under Vichy, 944
- Kay, Alex J., Jeff Rutherford, and David Stahel, editors, Nazi Policy on the Eastern Front, 1941: Total War, Genocide, and Radicalization (E), 980
- The Keelmen of Tyneside*, by Fewster, 928
- Keene, Derek, and Stefan Goebel, editors, Cities in Battlefields: Metropolitan Scenarios, Experiences, and Commemorations of Total War, 828
- Keene, Jennifer D. (R), 865
- Keire, Mara L. (R), 860
- Kenney, Padraic (R), 959
- Kennon, Donald R., and Paul Finkelman, editors, In the Shadow of Freedom: The Politics of Slavery in the National Capital, 847
- Kershaw, Paul J. E., Peaceful Kings: Peace, Power, and the Early Medieval Political Imagination, 913
- "The Kids Are All Right," by Cook, 746
- Kindsvatter, Peter S. (R), 894
- Kinser, Brent E., The American Civil War in the Shaping of British Democracy, 930
- Kirkland, Robert O. (R), 831
- Klein, Kerwin Lee, From History to Theory, 819
- Kligman, Gail, and Katherine Verdery, Peasants under Siege: The Collectivization of Romanian Agriculture, 1949–1962, 961
- Koditschek, Theodore, Liberalism, Imperialism, and the Historical Imagination: Nineteenth-Century Visions of a "Greater Britain", 933
- Kraft, James P. (R), 881
- Krasner, Jonathan B., The Benderly Boys and American Jewish Education, 889
- Krippner, Greta R., Capitalizing on Crisis: The Political Origins of the Rise of Finance, 898
- Krötzel, Christian, and Katariina Mustakallio, editors, On Old Age: Approaching Death in Antiquity and the Middle Ages (E), 978
- Kumar, Nita (R), 838
- Kushner, Barak (R), 836
- Kuzio, Taras (R), 968
- The Labour Party in Britain and Norway*, by Redvaldsen, 921
- LaCapra, Dominick (C), 989
- The Languages of Gift in the Early Middle Ages*, edited by Davies and Fouracre, 914
- Laybourn, Keith (R), 929
- LeCain, Timothy James (R), 876
- Lee, Shelley S. (R), 896
- Legacies of Stalingrad*, by Morina, 951
- Levy, James P. (R), 938
- Lewis, Carolyn Herbst (R), 878
- Liberalism, Imperialism, and the Historical Imagination*, by Koditschek, 933
- Lichtenstein, Alex (R), 853
- Limbaugh, Ronald H., Tungsten in Peace and War, 1918–1946, 876
- Lindemann, Mary (R), 946
- Linker, Beth, War's Waste: Rehabilitation in World War I America, 865
- Logan, Michael F. (R), 901
- Looking South*, by Frederickson, 853
- Maciejko, Paweł, The Mixed Multitude: Jacob Frank and the Frankist Movement, 1755–1816, 956
- MacLean, Gerald, and Nabil Matar, Britain and the Islamic World, 1558–1713, 924
- MacLeod, Dewar (R), 879
- Maddock, Shane J., Nuclear Apartheid: The Quest for American Atomic Supremacy from World War II to the Present, 877
- Magid, Shaul (R), 953
- Magnusson, Roberta J. (R), 954
- Making War, Making Women*, by McEuen, 874
- A Malleable Map*, by Wigen, 835
- Marcuse, Harold (R), 820
- Markovits, Inga, Justice in Lüritz: Experiencing Socialist Law in East Germany, 952
- Martin, Bradford (R), 887
- Mary Turner and the Memory of Lynching*, by Armstrong, 866
- Mason, Patrick Q., The Mormon Menace: Violence and Anti-Mormonism in the Postbellum South, 850
- Matar, Nabil, and Gerald MacLean, Britain and the Islamic World, 1558–1713, 924

- McCarthy, John M. (R), 854
- McCluskey, Fergal, Fenians and Ribbonmen: The Development of Republican Politics in East Tyrone, 1898–1918, 938
- McDuffie, Erik S., Sojourning for Freedom: Black Women, American Communism, and the Making of Black Left Feminism, 883
- McEuen, Melissa A., Making War, Making Women: Femininity and Duty on the American Home Front, 1941–1945, 874
- McLaren, Brian L. (R), 974
- McMillian, John, Smoking Typewriters: The Sixties Underground Press and the Rise of Alternative Media in America, 888
- Measuring America*, by Yarrow, 899
- Medoff, Rafael (R), 903
- Meier, William M., Property Crime in London, 1850–Present, 929
- Meléndez, Mariselle, Deviant and Useful Citizens: The Cultural Production of the Female Body in Eighteenth-Century Peru, 905
- Mello, William J., New York Longshoremen: Class and Power on the Docks, 871
- Meng, Michael (R), 951
- Militant Citizenship*, by Southard, 863
- Miller, Rod, and Arthur Pontynen, Western Culture at the American Crossroads: Conflicts over the Nature of Science and Reason, 842
- Miller, Steven P. (R), 891
- Minchin, Timothy J., and John A. Salmond, After the Dream: Black and White Southerners since 1965, 886
- Mirowski, Philip, Science-Mart: Privatizing American Science, 902
- The Mixed Multitude*, by Maciejko, 956
- Moitt, Bernard (R), 940
- Monarchy, Myth, and Material Culture in Germany 1750–1950*, by Giloi, 947
- The Monster Evil*, by Archer, 929
- Monteón, Michael (R), 907
- Morbid Curiosities*, by Alberti, 932
- Morgan, Cecilia (R), 937
- Morina, Christina, Legacies of Stalingrad: Remembering the Eastern Front in Germany since 1945, 951
- The Mormon Menace*, by Mason, 850
- Morrow, John H., Jr. (R), 921
- Morser, Eric (R), 855
- Morser, Eric J., Hinterland Dreams: The Political Economy of a Midwestern City, 854
- Mouritsen, Henrik, The Freedman in the Roman World, 909
- Mrs. Russell Sage*, by Crocker, 860
- Mukherjee, Mithi, India in the Shadows of Empire: A Legal and Political History 1774–1950, 837
- Multidirectional Memory*, by Rothberg, 820
- Muslim Expansion and Byzantine Collapse in North Africa*, by Kaegi, 972
- Mustakallio, Katariina, and Christian Krötzel, editors, On Old Age: Approaching Death in Antiquity and the Middle Ages (E), 978
- A Nation of Outsiders*, by Hale, 879
- Nationhood from Below*, edited by Van Ginderachter and Beyen (E), 979
- Nazi Policy on the Eastern Front, 1941*, edited by Kay, Rutherford, and Stahel (E), 980
- Neiberg, Michael S., Dance of the Furies: Europe and the Outbreak of World War I, 920
- New York Longshoremen*, by Mello, 871
- Newbury, Colin (C), 990
- Ninkovich, Frank, Global Dawn: The Cultural Foundation of American Internationalism, 1865–1890, 851
- No Sure Victory*, by Daddis, 894
- Noble, Thomas F. X., and John Van Engen, editors, European Transformations: The Long Twelfth Century (E), 977
- Norris, Stephen M. (R), 963
- “Not Yet Far Enough,” by Thomas, 794
- Nuclear Apartheid*, by Maddock, 877
- Nylan, Michael (R), 832
- Ogborn, Miles (R), 814
- O’Hara, S. Paul, Gary, the Most American of All American Cities, 855
- O’Mara, Margaret (R), 856
- On Old Age*, edited by Krötzel and Mustakallio (E), 978
- On the Far Western Front*, by Dehne, 904
- Osgerby, Bill (R), 880
- Osgood, Kenneth, and Andrew K. Frank, editors, Selling War in a Media Age: The Presidency and Public Opinion in the American Century, 875
- Ostendorf, Ann, Sounds American: National Identity and the Music Cultures of the Lower Mississippi River Valley, 1800–1860, 844
- Ott, Julia C., When Wall Street Met Main Street: The Quest for an Investors’ Democracy, 864
- Ott, Julia C. (R), 898
- Out of Left Field*, by Alpert, 870
- Paddock, Troy R. E. (R), 948
- Palaces of Time*, by Carlebach, 915
- Palmer, David (R), 871
- Palumbo-Liu, David, Bruce Robbins, and Nirvana Tanoukhi, editors, Immanuel Wallerstein and the Problem of the World: System, Scale, Culture, 822
- Paperno, Irina, Stories of the Soviet Experience: Memoirs, Diaries, Dreams, 968
- Pappademos, Melina, Black Political Activism and the Cuban Republic, 904
- Parable and Politics in Early Islamic History*, by El-Hibri, 971
- Patriarca, Silvana, and Lucy Riall, editors, The Risorgimento Revisited: Nationalism and Culture in Nineteenth-Century Italy (E), 979
- Patterson, James G., In the Wake of the Great Rebellion: Republicanism, Agrarianism and Banditry in Ireland after 1798, 927
- Peaceful Kings*, by Kershaw, 913
- Peasants under Siege*, by Kligman and Verdery, 961
- Pedagogy for Religion*, by Sengupta, 838
- Pendas, Devin O. (R), 952
- Perkins, Edwin J. (R), 864
- Perl-Rosenthal, Nathan, “Generational Turns,” 804
- Peto, Andrea (R), 959
- Petropoulos, Jonathan (R), 944

- Philliou, Christine M., Biography of an Empire: Governing Ottomans in an Age of Revolution, 973
- Philpott, William, Three Armies on the Somme: The First Battle of the Twentieth Century, 921
- Pickering, Mary (R), 943
- Pierce, Jennifer Burek, What Adolescents Ought to Know: Sexual Health Texts in Early Twentieth-Century America, 862
- Pitts, Jennifer (R), 933
- Pitzulo, Carrie, Bachelors and Bunnies: The Sexual Politics of Playboy, 880
- Platt, Kevin M. F., Terror and Greatness: Ivan and Peter as Russian Myths, 963
- Pogroms, Peasants, Jews, by Johnson, 931
- Polsgrove, Carol, Ending British Rule in Africa: Writers in a Common Cause, 976
- Pomakoy, Keith, Helping Humanity: American Policy and Genocide Rescue, 903
- Pontynen, Arthur, and Rod Miller, Western Culture at the American Crossroads: Conflicts over the Nature of Science and Reason, 842
- Poole, Andrea Geddes (R), 939
- Poole, W. Scott (R), 853
- Porter-Szűcs, Brian, Faith and Fatherland: Catholicism, Modernity, and Poland, 957
- Power, Politics, and the Missouri Synod*, by Burkee, 891
- Prescott, Heather Munro (R), 862
- Pritchard, Sara B., Confluence: The Nature of Technology and the Remaking of the Rhône, 945
- Private Practices*, by Wake, 878
- Proctor, Tammy M. (R), 828
- Property Crime in London, 1850–Present*, by Meier, 929
- Protest with Chinese Characteristics*, by Hung, 833
- The Purposes of Paradise*, by Skwiot, 858
- Racial Crossings*, by Salesa, 936
- Radicalism at the Crossroads*, by Gore, 883
- Raiford, Leigh, Imprisoned in a Luminous Glare: Photography and the African American Freedom Struggle, 886
- Ramos, Gabriela (R), 905
- Rapoport, Yossef (R), 971
- Rauchway, Eric (R), 872
- Reading Augustine in the Reformation*, by Visser, 916
- Redvaldsen, David, The Labour Party in Britain and Norway: Elections and the Pursuit of Power between the World Wars, 921
- Remembering Constantine at the Milvian Bridge*, by Van Dam, 911
- Revelation Restored*, by Johnston, 923
- Riall, Lucy, and Silvana Patriarca, editors, The Risorgimento Revisited: Nationalism and Culture in Nineteenth-Century Italy (E), 979
- Richard, Carl J. (R), 842
- Riess, Steven A., The Sport of Kings and the Kings of Crime: Horse Racing, Politics, and Organized Crime in New York, 1865–1913, 852
- Rinne, Katherine Wentworth, The Waters of Rome: Aqueducts, Fountains, and the Birth of the Baroque City, 954
- Risch, William Jay, The Ukrainian West: Culture and the Fate of Empire in Soviet Lviv, 968
- The Risorgimento Revisited*, edited by Patriarca and Riall (E), 979
- Robbins, Bruce, David Palumbo-Liu, and Nirvana Tanoukhi, editors, Immanuel Wallerstein and the Problem of the World: System, Scale, Culture, 822
- Roberts, Timothy Mason (R), 816
- Rochdale Village*, by Eisenstadt, 882
- Roche, Jeff (R), 893
- Roos, Julia, Weimar through the Lens of Gender: Prostitution Reform, Woman's Emancipation, and German Democracy, 1919–33, 950
- Rosenberg, Clifford, "The International Politics of Vaccine Testing in Interwar Algiers," 671
- Rothberg, Michael, Multidirectional Memory: Remembering the Holocaust in the Age of Decolonization, 820
- Rublack, Ulinka, Dressing Up: Cultural Identity in Renaissance Europe, 917
- Ruderman, David B. (R), 915
- Russian Orientalism*, by Schimmelpenninck van der Oye, 964
- Russia's Own Orient*, by Tolz, 964
- Rutherford, Jeff, Alex J. Kay, and David Stahel, editors, Nazi Policy on the Eastern Front, 1941: Total War, Genocide, and Radicalization (E), 980
- Sachsenmaier, Dominic, Global Perspectives on Global History: Theories and Approaches in a Connected World, 821
- Sacred Borders*, by Holland, 843
- Sahadeo, Jeff (R), 964
- Des saints d'État? Politique et sainteté au temps du concile de Trente*, edited by Buttay and Guillausseau (E), 978
- Salesa, Damon Ieremia, Racial Crossings: Race, Intermarriage, and the Victorian British Empire, 936
- Salmond, John A., and Timothy J. Minchin, After the Dream: Black and White Southerners since 1965, 886
- Salomon, Carlos Manuel (R), 848
- Salt in the Sand*, by Frazier, 907
- Sanders, Jeffrey Craig, Seattle and the Roots of Urban Sustainability: Inventing Ecotopia, 901
- Sanders, Paula, Creating Medieval Cairo: Empire, Religion, and Architectural Preservation in Nineteenth-Century Egypt, 974
- Sarajevo, 1941–1945*, by Greble, 962
- Sarantakes, Nicholas Evan, Dropping the Torch: Jimmy Carter, the Olympic Boycott, and the Cold War, 900
- Saunders, Robert (R), 930
- The Scandal of Kabbalah*, by Dweck, 953
- Schachter, Judith Modell (R), 840
- Schickore, Jutta (R), 825
- Schimmelpenninck van der Oye, David, Russian Orientalism: Asia in the Russian Mind from Peter the Great to the Emigration, 964
- Schor, Adam M. (R), 970
- Schreier, Joshua, Arabs of the Jewish Faith: The Civilizing Mission in Colonial Algeria, 975
- Schultz, Kevin M., Tri-Faith America: How Catholics and Jews Held Postwar America to Its Protestant Promise, 890
- Schwartz, David G. (R), 852
- Schwarz, Bill (R), 976
- Schwarz, Vera (R), 829
- Science-Mart*, by Mirowski, 902

- Scott, Jonathan, When the Waves Ruled Britannia: Geography and Political Identities, 1500–1800, 925
- A Search for Sovereignty*, by Benton, 814
- Seattle and the Roots of Urban Sustainability*, by Sanders, 901
- Segal, Ethan Isaac, Coins, Trade, and the State: Economic Growth in Early Medieval Japan, 834
- Seipp, Adam R. (R), 950
- Selling War in a Media Age*, edited by Osgood and Frank, 875
- Sengupta, Parna, Pedagogy for Religion: Missionary Education and the Fashioning of Hindus and Muslims in Bengal, 838
- Sharma, Jayeeta (R), 936
- Shaw, Matthew, Time and the French Revolution: The Republican Calendar, 1789–Year XIV, 941
- Sheehan, Tanya, Doctored: The Medicine of Photography in Nineteenth-Century America, 861
- Sieber, Patricia (R), 832
- Siekmeier, James, The Bolivian Revolution and the United States, 1952 to the Present, 831
- Simpson, James, Creating Wine: The Emergence of a World Industry, 1840–1914, 824
- Sitting In and Speaking Out*, by Turner, 885
- Skinner, Quentin, editor, Families and States in Western Europe, 922
- Skwiot, Christine, The Purposes of Paradise: U.S. Tourism and Empire in Cuba and Hawai'i, 858
- Slaughter, Jane (R), 955
- Small, Melvin (R), 875
- Smith, Scott B., Captives of Revolution: The Socialist Revolutionaries and the Bolshevik Dictatorship, 1918–1923, 967
- Smith, Vanessa (C), 990
- Smoking Typewriters*, by McMillian, 888
- Snyder, Sarah B., Human Rights Activism and the End of the Cold War: A Transnational History of the Helsinki Network, 830
- The Society of Equality*, by Wood, 906
- Sojourning for Freedom*, by McDuffie, 883
- Sounds American*, by Ostendorf, 844
- Southard, Belinda A. Stillion, Militant Citizenship: Rhetorical Strategies of the National Woman's Party, 1913–1920, 863
- Sparrow, James T., Warfare State: World War II Americans and the Age of Big Government, 873
- Spodek, Howard, Ahmedabad: Shock City of Twentieth-Century India, 839
- The Sport of Kings and the Kings of Crime*, by Riess, 852
- Stahel, David, Alex J. Kay, and Jeff Rutherford, editors, Nazi Policy on the Eastern Front, 1941: Total War, Genocide, and Radicalization (E), 980
- Stanley, Amy Dru (R), 867
- Stapleford, Thomas A. (R), 899
- Stedman, Andrew David, Alternatives to Appeasement: Neville Chamberlain and Hitler's Germany, 938
- Stephenson, Scott, The Final Battle: Soldiers on the Western Front and the German Revolution of 1918, 949
- Stevens, Jason (R), 890
- Stevenson, David, With Our Backs to the Wall: Victory and Defeat in 1918, 827
- Stories of the Soviet Experience*, by Paperno, 968
- Stormy Weather*, by Curwood, 869
- Strong-Boag, Veronica, Fostering Nation? Canada Confronts Its History of Childhood Disadvantage, 841
- Surkis, Judith, "When Was the Linguistic Turn? A Genealogy," 700
- Tabili, Laura, Global Migrants, Local Culture: Natives and Newcomers in Provincial England, 1841–1939, 935
- Tal, David (R), 877
- Tanoukhi, Nirvana, David Palumbo-Liu, and Bruce Robbins, editors, Immanuel Wallerstein and the Problem of the World: System, Scale, Culture, 822
- Taylor, David (R), 929
- Technology of Empire*, by Yang, 836
- Teisch, Jessica B., Engineering Nature: Water, Development, and the Global Spread of American Environmental Expertise, 826
- The Temp Economy*, by Hatton, 881
- A Tenth of a Second*, by Canales, 825
- Terror and Greatness*, by Platt, 963
- Thomas, Julia Adeney, "Not Yet Far Enough," 794
- Thomas, Martin, editor, The French Colonial Mind (E), 979
- Thomas, Tracy A., and Tracey Jean Boisseau, editors, Feminist Legal History: Essays on Women and Law, 867
- Thompson, Shirley E. (R), 844
- Thornton, Sybil Anne (R), 834
- Three Armies on the Somme*, by Philpott, 921
- Thum, Gregor, Uprooted: How Breslau Became Wrocław during the Century of Expulsions, 959
- Time and the French Revolution*, by Shaw, 941
- Tolz, Vera, Russia's Own Orient: The Politics of Identity and Oriental Studies in the Late Imperial and Early Soviet Periods, 964
- Tomek, Beverly C., Colonization and Its Discontents: Emancipation, Emigration, and Antislavery in Antebellum Pennsylvania, 845
- Tønnesson, Stein (R), 895
- Trading Places*, by Dobie, 940
- The Traffic in Babies*, by Balcom, 840
- The Transformation of Turkey*, by Göçek, 975
- Tri-Faith America*, by Schultz, 890
- Trivedi, Lisa (R), 839
- Tumarkin, Nina (R), 968
- Tungsten in Peace and War, 1918–1946*, by Limbaugh, 876
- Turner, Jeffrey A., Sitting In and Speaking Out: Student Movements in the American South, 1960–1970, 885
- Tutino, Stefania (R), 916
- The Ukrainian West*, by Risch, 968
- Unruly Spirits*, by Brower, 943
- Upheaval in Charleston*, by Williams and Hoffius, 853
- Uprooted*, by Thum, 959
- Usborne, Cornelia (R), 950
- Vall, Natasha, Cultural Region: North East England, 1945–2000, 939
- Vallejos, Julio Pinto (R), 906
- Valorizing the Barbarians*, by Adler, 910
- Van Dam, Raymond, Remembering Constantine at the Milvian Bridge, 911

- van de Pol, Lotte, The Burgher and the Whore: Prostitution in Early Modern Amsterdam, 946
- Van Engen, John, and Thomas F. X. Noble, editors, European Transformations: The Long Twelfth Century (E), 977
- Van Ginderachter, Maarten, and Marnix Beyen, editors, Nationhood from Below: Europe in the Long Nineteenth Century (E), 979
- VanderMeer, Philip, Desert Visions and the Making of Phoenix, 1860–2009, 856
- Vang, Chia Youyee, Hmong America: Reconstructing Community in Diaspora, 896
- Veesser, Cyrus (R), 858
- Verdery, Katherine, and Gail Kligman, Peasants under Siege: The Collectivization of Romanian Agriculture, 1949–1962, 961
- Verhey, Jeffrey (R), 949
- Visser, Arnoud S. Q., Reading Augustine in the Reformation: The Flexibility of Intellectual Authority in Europe, 1500–1620, 916
- Volpp, Sophie, Worldly Stage: Theatricality in Seventeenth-Century China, 832
- Wagner, Peter (R), 822
- Wailoo, Keith, How Cancer Crossed the Color Line, 865
- Wake, Naoko, Private Practices: Harry Stack Sullivan, the Science of Homosexuality, and American Liberalism, 878
- Walker, Anders (R), 886
- War, Peace, and Alliance in Demosthenes' Athens*, by Hunt, 907
- Warfare State*, by Sparrow, 873
- War's Waste*, by Linker, 865
- Warshauer, Matthew, Connecticut in the American Civil War: Slavery, Sacrifice, and Survival, 849
- The Waters of Rome*, by Rinne, 954
- 'We have no King but Christ,' by Wood, 970
- Weimar through the Lens of Gender*, by Roos, 950
- Wellington's Men in Australia*, by Wright, 839
- Western Culture at the American Crossroads*, by Pontynen and Miller, 842
- What Adolescents Ought to Know*, by Pierce, 862
- Wheatland, Thomas (R), 879
- Wheeler-Barclay, Marjorie (R), 934
- When the Waves Ruled Britannia*, by Scott, 925
- When Wall Street Met Main Street*, by Ott, 864
- "When Was the Linguistic Turn? A Genealogy," by Surkis, 700
- White, Stephen D. (R), 914
- Wigen, Kären, A Malleable Map: Geographies of Restoration in Central Japan, 1600–1912, 835
- Wilder, Gary, "From Optic to Topic: The Foreclosure Effect of Historiographic Turns," 723
- Williams, Daniel K., God's Own Party: The Making of the Christian Right, 892
- Williams, Rosalind (R), 945
- Williams, Susan Millar, and Stephen G. Hoffius, Upheaval in Charleston: Earthquake and Murder on the Eve of Jim Crow, 853
- Williams, Yohuru (R), 820
- Willis, Roxanne, Alaska's Place in the West: From the Last Frontier to the Last Great Wilderness, 859
- Wilson, Lori Lee, The Joaquín Band: The History behind the Legend, 848
- With Our Backs to the Wall*, by Stevenson, 827
- Wodziński, Marcin (R), 956
- Woessner, Martin, Heidegger in America, 879
- Wolff, Larry (R), 957
- Women and the Great War*, by Belzer, 955
- Women, Communism, and Industrialization in Postwar Poland*, by Fidelis, 959
- Wood, James A., The Society of Equality: Popular Republicanism and Democracy in Santiago de Chile, 1818–1851, 906
- Wood, Philip, 'We have no King but Christ': Christian Political Thought in Greater Syria on the Eve of the Arab Conquest (c.400–585), 970
- Woollacott, Angela (R), 839
- A World on Fire*, by Foreman, 816
- Worldly Stage*, by Volpp, 832
- Worthington, Ian (R), 907
- Wright, Christine, Wellington's Men in Australia: Peninsular War Veterans and the Making of Empire c. 1820–40, 839
- Yang, Daqing, Technology of Empire: Telecommunications and Japanese Expansion in Asia, 1883–1945, 836
- Yarrow, Andrew L., Measuring America: How Economic Growth Came to Define American Greatness in the Late Twentieth Century, 899
- Zahra, Tara (R), 922
- Zierler, David, The Invention of Ecocide: Agent Orange, Vietnam, and the Scientists Who Changed the Way We Think about the Environment, 895
- Zwicker, Lisa Fetheringill, Dueling Students: Conflict, Masculinity, and Politics in German Universities, 1890–1914, 948

American Historical Association

Founded in 1884. Chartered by Congress in 1889.
Office: 400 A St. SE, Washington, DC 20003

President: William Cronon, University of Wisconsin-Madison
President-Elect: Kenneth Pomeranz, University of California, Irvine
Executive Director: James R. Grossman
Controller: Randy Norell

MEMBERSHIP: Persons interested in historical studies, whether professionally or otherwise, are invited to membership. The present membership and subscription total is approximately 18,000. Members elect the officers by ballot.

MEETINGS: The Association's next annual meeting will take place January 3–6, 2013, in New Orleans. Many professional historical groups meet within or jointly with the Association at this time. The Pacific Coast Branch holds separate meetings on the Pacific Coast and publishes the Pacific Historical Review.

PUBLICATIONS AND SERVICES: The American Historical Review is published five times a year and is sent to all members. It is available by subscription to institutions. The Association also publishes Perspectives (a newsmagazine with classified listings) and a variety of pamphlets on historical subjects. To promote history and assist historians, the Association offers other services, including a Department and Organization Services Program. It also maintains close relations with international, specialized, state, and local historical societies through conferences and correspondence.

BOOK PRIZES: The Herbert Baxter Adams Prize, awarded annually for a first book in the field of European history. The George Louis Beer Prize, awarded annually for a book on any phase of European international history since 1895. The Albert J. Beveridge Award, given annually for the best book on the history of the United States, Latin America, or Canada since 1492. The Paul Birdsall Prize, awarded biennially for a major work by a U.S. or Canadian historian in European military and strategic history since 1870. The James Henry Breasted Prize, awarded annually for the best book in English in any field of history prior to 1000 A.D. The Albert B. Corey Prize, awarded biennially for the best book on the history of Canadian-American relations, administered jointly with the Canadian Historical Association. The John H. Dunning Prize, awarded biennially for a book on any subject in U.S. history. The John K. Fairbank Prize, awarded annually for East Asian history substantially after the year 1800. The Morris D. Forkosch Prize, awarded annually to the best book in British, British imperial, or British Commonwealth history. The Leo Gershoy Award, given annually for outstanding work in seventeenth- or eighteenth-century western European history. The Clarence H. Haring Prize, awarded every five years for Latin American history by a Latin American. The J. Franklin Jameson Prize, awarded every two years for outstanding editorial achievement. The Joan Kelly Memorial Prize, awarded annually for the best book in women's history. The Martin A. Klein Prize in African History, awarded annually for the most distinguished work of scholarship on continental Africa, including those islands usually treated as countries of Africa. The Waldo G. Leland Prize, awarded every five years for the most outstanding reference tool. The Littleton-Griswold Prize, awarded annually for the best work on the history of American law and society. The J. Russell Major Prize, awarded annually for the best work in English on any aspect of French history. The Helen and Howard R. Marraro Prize, awarded annually for Italian or Italian-U.S. history. The George L. Mosse Prize, awarded annually for European intellectual and cultural history since the Renaissance. The Premio del Rey Prize, awarded biennially for early Spanish history and culture (500–1516 A.D.). The James A. Rawley Prize in Atlantic History, awarded annually for an outstanding book in the history of the Atlantic worlds before the twentieth century. The John F. Richards Prize, awarded annually for the best book in South Asian history. The James Harvey Robinson Prize, awarded biennially for the teaching aid that has made the most outstanding contribution to the teaching of history. The Wesley-Logan Prize, awarded annually in African Diaspora history by the AHA and the Association for the Study of African American Life and History. Book prizes are awarded at each AHA annual meeting.

CORRESPONDENCE: Inquiries for the AHA should be addressed to Executive Director, 400 A St. SE, Washington, DC 20003. Our e-mail address is aha@historians.org. Our web address is <http://www.historians.org>.

Inquiries for the AHR Editorial Office, including correspondence regarding manuscript submissions and books for review, should be addressed to Editor, American Historical Review, 914 E. Atwater Ave., Bloomington, IN 47401. Our e-mail address is ahr@indiana.edu. No manuscript will be considered for publication if it is concurrently under consideration by another journal or press or if it has been published or is soon to be published elsewhere. Both restrictions apply to the substance as well as to the exact wording of the manuscript. If the manuscript is accepted, the editors expect that its appearance in the AHR will precede republication of the essay, or any significant part thereof, in another work. Specific guidelines and policies for the preparation of manuscripts for submission to and publication in the AHR can be found at www.americanhistoricalreview.org or will be sent upon request. Unsolicited book reviews are not accepted.

CAMBRIDGE

BEST IN SCHOLARSHIP from CAMBRIDGESecond EditionA Concise History of Bolivia

HERBERT S. KLEIN

Cambridge Concise Histories

$87.00: Hb: 978-1-107-00568-6

$27.99: Pb: 978-0-521-18372-7:

376 pp.

Being a Historian

An Introduction to the Professional World of History

JAMES M. BANNER, JR

$99.00: Hb: 978-1-107-02159-4

$27.99: Pb: 978-1-107-69728-7:

288 pp.

Feminism, Absolutism, and Jansenism

Louis XIV and the Port-Royal Nuns

DANIELLA KOSTROUN

$90.00: Hb: 978-1-107-00045-2:

288 pp.

Godly Kingship in Restoration England

The Politics of The Royal Supremacy, 1660–1688

JACQUELINE ROSE

Cambridge Studies in Early Modern British History

$99.00: Hb: 978-1-107-01142-7:

336 pp.

Jefferson's Freeholders and the Politics of Ownership in the Old Dominion

CHRISTOPHER MICHAEL CURTIS

Cambridge Studies on the American South

$90.00: Hb: 978-1-107-01740-5:

272 pp.

The Encyclopedia of Migration and Minorities in Europe

From the 17th Century to the Present

*Edited by*KLAUS J. BADE, PIETER C. EMMER,
LEO LUCASSEN, and JOCHEN OLTMER

$185.00: Hb: 978-0-521-89586-6:

860 pp.

The Golden State in the Civil War

Thomas Starr King, the Republican Party, and the Birth of Modern California

GLENNA MATTHEWS

$95.00: Hb: 978-0-521-19400-6

$25.99: Pb: 978-1-107-63921-8:

224 pp.

The Physiocrats and the World of the Enlightenment

LIANA VARDI

$99.00: Hb: 978-1-107-02119-8:

328 pp.

The Republican Party and American Politics from Hoover to Reagan

ROBERT MASON

$80.00: Hb: 978-1-107-00704-8:

320 pp.

Prices subject to change.www.cambridge.org/usCAMBRIDGE
UNIVERSITY PRESS

CAMBRIDGE

BEST IN SCHOLARSHIP from CAMBRIDGE

The Roots of English Colonialism in Ireland

JOHN PATRICK
MONTAÑO

Critical Perspectives on Empire

$99.00: Hb: 978-0-521-19828-8;
440 pp.

The Struggle for the Files

The Western Allies and the Return of German Archives after the Second World War

ASTRID M. ECKERT

Publications of the German Historical Institute

$99.00: Hb: 978-0-521-88018-3;
440 pp.

The Unwieldy American State

Administrative Politics Since the New Deal

JOANNA L. GRISINGER

$85.00: Hb: 978-1-107-00432-0;
328 pp.

The War of 1812 Conflict for a Continent

J. C. A. STAGG

Cambridge Essential Histories

$85.00: Hb: 978-0-521-89820-1
$24.99: Pb: 978-0-521-72686-3;
240 pp.

Violence against Prisoners of War in the First World War

Britain, France and Germany, 1914–1920

HEATHER JONES

Studies in the Social and Cultural History of Modern Warfare

$110.00: Hb: 978-0-521-11758-6;
468 pp.

When the Waves Ruled Britannia

Geography and Political Identities, 1500–1800

JONATHAN SCOTT

$93.00: Hb: 978-0-521-19591-1
$33.99: Pb: 978-0-521-15241-9;
236 pp.

William Howard Taft: The Travails of a Progressive Conservative

JONATHAN LURIE

$90.00: Hb: 978-0-521-51421-7;
230 pp.

Now in Paperback!

General Editors:

MELVYN P. LEFFLER,
University of Virginia

ODD ARNE WESTAD,
London School of Economics and Political Science

Series:

THE CAMBRIDGE HISTORY OF THE COLD WAR

Volume 1,
Origins

Volume 2,
Crises and Détente

Volume 3,
Endings

Also available as a
3 volume set

Prices subject to change.

www.cambridge.org/us

CAMBRIDGE
UNIVERSITY PRESS

New From HarperCollins

Cronkite

Douglas Brinkley

"Treats Cronkite as not just an icon, but as a real human with passions, loves, and occasional enmities. It's a fascinating and valuable tale." —Walter Isaacson

Harper: 978-0-06-137426-5 (hc)
$34.99 ($38.99 Can.) ■ 832 pages

The American Bible

How Our Words Unite, Divide, and Define a Nation

Stephen Prothero

Stephen Prothero identifies the words that have shaped our national identity and provides commentary from prominent thinkers to create a crash course in the great "American scriptures."

HarperOne: 978-0-06-212343-5 (hc)
$29.99 ($38.99 Can.) ■ 544 pages

The Storm of War

A New History of the Second World War

Andrew Roberts

"A book that manages to be distinctive but not eccentric, comprehensive in scope but not cramped by detail, giving due weight both to the extraordinary personalities and to the blind economic and physical forces involved." —The Atlantic

Harper Perennial: 978-0-06-122860-5 (pb)
$19.99 ■ 800 pages

The Party

The Secret World of China's Communist Rulers

Richard McGregor

"A lively and penetrating account of a party that, since its founding in Shanghai as a clandestine organization in 1921, has clung to secrecy as an inviolable principle." —Washington Post

Harper: 978-0-06-170876-3 (pb)
$16.99 ($18.99 Can.) ■ 336 pages

The Codex Canadensis and the Writings of Louis Nicolas
The Natural History of the New World, Histoire Naturelle des Indes Occidentales
Edited and with an introduction by François-Marc Gagnon, with Nancy Senior and Réal Ouellet
978-0-7735-3876-4 $95.00 cloth

A natural history and illustrations of the New World in the seventeenth century.

Organized Patriotism and the Crucible of War

Popular Imperialism in Britain, 1914–1932

Matthew C. Hendley

978-0-7735-3961-7 $95.00 cloth

How the First World War made women central to popular imperialism in Britain

Ulster's Men
Protestant Unionist Masculinities and Militarization in the North of Ireland, 1912–1923

Jane G.V. McGaughey

978-0-7735-3972-3 $95.00 cloth

Heroism, propaganda, unionism, and violence in Ireland during the Great War.

McGILL-QUEEN'S UNIVERSITY PRESS

mqup.ca

Follow us on Facebook.com/McGillQueens and Twitter.com/Scholarmqup

NYUPRESS

Keep reading.

Under the Shadow of Napoleon

French Influence on the American Way of Warfare from Independence to the Eve of World War II
MICHAEL BONURA

"An excellent volume."

—Donald D. Horward,
Founding Director of the Institute on Napoleon and the French Revolution

$55.00 ■ CLOTH

In the Warfare and Culture series

Forging Napoleon's Grande Armée

Motivation, Military Culture, and Masculinity in the French Army, 1800–1808
MICHAEL J. HUGHES

"A fascinating study."

—Frederick C. Schneid, author of Napoleon's Conquest of Europe

$50.00 • CLOTH

In the Warfare and Culture series

NEW IN PAPERBACK

Empire of Sacrifice

The Religious Origins of American Violence
JON PAHL

"[A] broad-sweeping scholarly examination."

—Jeffrey Williams,
American Historical Review

$23.00 ■ PAPER

Class Unknown

Undercover Investigations of American Work and Poverty from the Gilded Age to the Present
MARK PITTENGER

"Wide-ranging, erudite, and fascinating."

—George B. Cotkin,
California Polytechnic
State University

$25.00 ■ PAPER

In the Culture, Labor, History series

Mainline Christianity

The Past and Future of America's Majority Faith
JASON S. LANTZER

"Provides ■ wide-ranging survey and trenchant critique."

—Thomas S. Kidd, author of God of Liberty

$24.00 • PAPER

NEW IN PAPERBACK

Working the Diaspora

The Impact of African Labor on the Anglo-American World, 1650–1850
FREDERICK C. KNIGHT

"An informed, deeply researched, and well-written study."

—Journal of American History

$23.00 • PAPER

In the Culture, Labor, History series

Jewish Radicals

A Documentary Reader
TONY MICHELS

"A feast of documents... [Michels] is an expert guide to their meaning and context."

—Michael Kazin, author of American Dreamers

$24.00 ■ PAPER

In the Goldstein-Goren Series in American Jewish History

Atlas of the Great Irish Famine

Edited by JOHN CROWLEY, WILLIAM J. SMYTH and MIKE MURPHY

Considers how such a near total decimation of ■ country by natural causes could take place in industrialized, 19th century Europe and situates the Great Famine alongside other world famines for ■ more globally informed approach.

$75.00 ■ CLOTH
8 1/2" X 11"
500 ILLUSTRATIONS

NYU PRESS IS A MEMBER OF THE University Press

Content Consortium

NEW from OXFORD

The Weight of Vengeance

The United States, the British Empire, and the War of 1812

TROY BICKHAM

2012 Hardback $34.95

The Origins of Sex

A History of the First Sexual Revolution

FARAMERZ DABHOIWALA

2012 Hardback $34.95

Sick from Freedom

African-American Illness and Suffering during the Civil War and Reconstruction

JIM DOWNS

2012 Hardback $29.95

The Indian Great Awakening

Religion and the Shaping of Native Cultures in Early America

LINFORD D. FISHER

2012 Hardback $34.95

Man's Estate

Landed Gentry Masculinities, 1660-1900

HENRY FRENCH and MARK ROTHERY

2012 Hardback $125.00

Fateful Lightning

A New History of the Civil War and Reconstruction

ALLEN C. GUELZO

2012 Paperback $19.95

The Acadian Diaspora

An Eighteenth-Century History

CHRISTOPHER HODSON

2012 Hardback $34.95

City Women

Money, Sex, and the Social Order in Early Modern London

ELEANOR HUBBARD

2012 Hardback $125.00

■ New in Paperback ■

Angel Island

Immigrant Gateway to America

ERIKA LEE and JUDY YUNG

2012 Paperback $21.95

On the Edge of the Cold War

American Diplomats and Spies in Postwar Prague

IGOR LUKES

2012 Hardback $34.95

The Catonsville Nine

A Story of Faith and Resistance in the Vietnam Era

SHAWN FRANCIS PETERS

2012 Hardback $34.95

The Production of Difference

Race and the Management of Labor in U.S. History

DAVID R. ROEDIGER and ELIZABETH D. ESCH

2012 Hardback $34.95

The Mongols

A Very Short Introduction

MORRIS ROSSABI

2012 Paperback $11.95

Hippies, Indians, and the Fight for Red Power

SHERRY L. SMITH

2012 Hardback $34.95

The Oxford Handbook of Postwar European History

Edited by DAN STONE

2012 Hardback $185.00

For Liberty and Equality

The Life and Times of the Declaration of Independence

ALEXANDER TSESIS

2012 Hardback $29.95

Prices are subject to change and apply only in the US.
To order or for more information, visit our website at www.oup.com/us

OXFORD
UNIVERSITY PRESS

New from Palgrave Macmillan

NEW REVISED EDITION!

A HISTORY OF AFRICA

Kevin Shillington

June 2012 / 528 pp.

978-0-230-30847-3 / $39.00 pb. (C$45.00)

AFRICA SINCE INDEPENDENCE

Paul Nugent

June 2012 / 680 pp.

978-0-230-27288-0 / $39.00 pb. (C$45.00)

THE KNIGHTS HOSPITALIER IN THE LEVANT, C. 1070-1309

Jonathan Riley-Smith

June 2012 / 352 pp.

978-0-230-29083-9 / $105.00 hc. (C$121.00)

THE DISARMAMENT OF HATRED

Marc Sangnier, French Catholicism and the Legacy of the First World War, 1914-45

Gearóid Barry

2012 / 312 pp.

978-0-230-21825-3 / $85.00 hc. (C$98.00)

RESPONSES TO NAZISM IN BRITAIN, 1933-1939

Before War and Holocaust

Dan Stone

June 2012 / 256 pp.

978-1-137-02245-5 / $30.00 pb. (C$34.50)

AT THE EDGES OF LIBERALISM Junctions of European, German, and Jewish History

Steven E. Aschheim

Palgrave Studies in Cultural and Intellectual History

2012 / 272 pp.

978-1-137-00228-0 / $30.00 pb. (C$34.50)

A MONARCHY OF LETTERS

Royal Correspondence and English Diplomacy in the Reign of Elizabeth I

Rayne Allinson

Queenship and Power

June 2012 / 270 pp.

978-1-137-00835-0 / $90.00 hc. (C$104.00)

THREE MEDIEVAL QUEENS

Queenship and the Crown in Fourteenth-Century England

Lisa Benz St. John

Queenship and Power

June 2012 / 266 pp.

978-0-230-11285-8 / $85.00 hc. (C$98.00)

WICKED WOMEN OF TUDOR ENGLAND

Queens, Aristocrats, Commoners

Retha M. Warnicke

Queenship and Power

2012 / 282 pp.

978-1-137-03237-9 / $27.00 pb. (C$31.00)

THE DIPLOMATIC EDUCATION OF FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, 1882-1933

Graham Cross

The World of the Roosevelt's

June 2012 / 272 pp.

978-1-137-01453-5 / $85.00 hc. (C$98.00)

DEBATING AMERICAN EXCEPTIONALISM

Empire and Democracy in the Wake of the Spanish-American War

Fabian Hilfrich

July 2012 / 304 pp.

978-0-230-39289-2 / $90.00 hc. (C$104.00)

THE BOOK OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT

A Life of the Conqueror

Edited By Richard Stoneman

June 2012 / 192 pp.

978-1-84885-294-5 / $19.95 pb. (C$22.95)

I.B. Tauris

THE VICTIMS RETURN

Survivors of the Gulag after Stalin

Stephen F. Cohen

June 2012 / 224 pp.

978-1-78076-137-4 / $14.00 pb. (C$16.00)

I.B. Tauris

RALPH WALDO EMERSON IN EUROPE

Class, Race and Revolution in the Making of an American Thinker

Daniel Koch

June 2012 / 304 pp.

978-1-84885-946-3 / $96.00 hc. (C$110.00)

I.B. Tauris

QUEEN VICTORIA

A Life

Lytton Strachey

June 2012 / 448 pp.

978-1-78076-048-3 / $18.00 pb. (C$20.00)

Tauris Parke Paperbacks

ROME ON THE EUPHRATES

The Story of a Frontier

Freya Stark

The Freya Stark Collection

July 2012 / 528 pp.

978-1-84885-314-0 / $19.00 pb. (C$22.00)

Tauris Parke Paperbacks

ELIZABETH AND ESSEX

A Tragic History

Lytton Strachey

June 2012 / 304 pp.

978-1-78076-049-0 / $18.00 pb. (C$20.00)

Tauris Parke Paperbacks

HABERMAS AND EUROPEAN INTEGRATION

Social and cultural modernity beyond the nation-state

Shivdeep Grewal

Europe in Change

June 2012 / 144 pp.

978-0-7190-7870-5 / $100.00 hc.

Manchester University Press

ABANDONING HISTORICAL CONFLICT?

Former Political Prisoners and Reconciliation in Northern Ireland

Peter Shirlow, Jonathan Tonge and

James W. McAuley

June 2012 / 224 pp.

978-0-7190-8744-8 / $29.95 pb.

Manchester University Press

THE POLITICS OF REGICIDE IN ENGLAND 1760-1850

Troublesome Subjects

Steve Poole

June 2012 / 240 pp.

978-0-7190-8746-2 / $26.95 pb.

Manchester University Press

LATIN AMERICA IN THE 21ST CENTURY

Nations, Regionalism, Globalization

Gian Luca Gardini

May 2012 / 160 pp.

978-1-78032-088-5 / $26.95 pb.

New from Stanford University Press

In the Wake of War Democratization and Internal Armed Conflict in Latin America

Edited by
CYNTHIA J. ARNSON
Copublished with the Woodrow Wilson Center Press
$24.95 paper $65.00 cloth

New Babylonians A History of Jews in Modern Iraq

ORIT BASHKIN
$24.95 paper $80.00 cloth

Emma Goldman: A Documentary History of the American Years, Volume 3

Light and Shadows, 1910–1916
Edited by CANDACE FALK
$65.00 cloth

The Premise of Fidelity Science, Visuality, and Representing the Real in Nineteenth-Century Japan

MAKI FUKUOKA
$45.00 cloth

"We Are Now the True Spaniards" Sovereignty, Revolution, Independence, and the Emergence of the Federal Republic of Mexico, 1808–1824

JAIME E. RODRÍGUEZ O.
$70.00 cloth

Barricades and Banners The Revolution of 1905 and the Transformation of Warsaw Jewry

SCOTT URY
Stanford Studies in Jewish History and Culture
$60.00 cloth

Hip Figures A Literary History of the Democratic Party

MICHAEL F. SZALAY
Post 45
$24.95 paper $80.00 cloth

Opera and the City The Politics of Culture in Beijing, 1770–1900

ANDREA S. GOLDMAN
$55.00 cloth

Paolina's Innocence Child Abuse in Casanova's Venice

LARRY WOLFF
$29.95 paper
$90.00 cloth

Most Stanford titles are available in e-books:
www.sup.org/ebooks

Stanford University Press

800.621.2736 www.sup.org

Desert Rose

The Life and Legacy of Coretta Scott King

Edythe Scott Bagley with Joe Hilley • Afterword by Bernice A. King

"A loving portrait, filled with anecdotes, family stories, historical footnotes, and memories only a sister could provide."

—Pearl Cleage, author of Till You Hear From Me: A Novel and the play A Song for Coretta

978-0-8173-1765-2 • 360 pp. • $34.95 cloth

978-0-8173-8612-2 • $27.95 ebook

Darkroom

A Memoir in Black & White

Lila Quintero Weaver

"A vivid, insightful, and moving illustrated graphic memoir. . . . In beautiful gray-shaded drawings, Weaver depicts the reality of the segregated and newly integrated South."

—Publishers Weekly

978-0-8173-5714-6 • 264 pp. • $24.95 paper

978-0-8173-8619-1 • $19.95 ebook

Tohopeka

Rethinking the Creek War & the War of 1812

Edited by Kathryn E. Holland Braund

"An interesting interdisciplinary collection of essays on a timely topic, quite readable by the nonspecialist."

—Robbie Ethridge, coeditor of Light on the Path: The Anthropology and History of the Southeastern Indians

978-0-8173-5711-5 • 272 pp. • $29.95 paper

978-0-8173-8615-3 • $23.95 ebook

Available
July 2012

Recovering the Margins of American Religious History

The Legacy of David Edwin Harrell Jr.

Edited by B. Dwain Waldrep and Scott C. Billingsley

"A significant, substantive, and generally compelling work."

—William Vance Trollinger Jr., author of God's Empire: William Bell Riley and Midwestern Fundamentalism

978-0-8173-5708-5 • 152 pp. • $22.95 paper

978-0-8173-8609-2 • $18.95 ebook

Available
May 2012

• Alabama •

THE UNIVERSITY OF ALABAMA PRESS

800-621-2736 • uapress.ua.edu

American History

FROM CHICAGO

Segregation

A Global History of Divided Cities

Carl H. Nightingale

"Nightingale has written a book of enormous ambition—and accomplishment. Moving between broad patterns and local detail, he has produced a global history of modern coerced racial segregation from its imperial origins to postwar suburbanization."—Thomas Bender, New York University

CLOTH $35.00

Conceived in Doubt

Religion and Politics in the New American Nation

Amanda Porterfield

"Conceived in Doubt covers much ground in cultural and political history, marshaling a wide array of evidence for Porterfield's innovative claims about the relationship of evangelical religion and politics in the early United States."—Kirsten Fischer, University of Minnesota

CLOTH $40.00

Face Value

The Entwined Histories of Money and Race in America

Michael O'Malley

"O'Malley's witty, insightful Face Value traces the American quest for a stable source of value in a society that prized freedom. . . . O'Malley shows that arguments over money and arguments over race have had much in common, and indeed, have often intersected in the United States in surprising and disturbing ways—even now."—Adam Rothman, Georgetown University

PAPER $25.00

The Chicago Companion to Tocqueville's Democracy in America

James T. Schleifer

"Schleifer includes so many excellent quotations to illustrate his points that it's conceivable that this book might be read tout seul, as a substitute for the real thing! I hope not. But virtually everything one needs to know about Democracy, including a taste for Tocqueville's prose, is included in this fine companion."

—Michael Kammen, Cornell University

PAPER $15.00

History of Science

FROM CHICAGO

American Sunshine

Diseases of Darkness and the Quest for Natural Light

Daniel Freund

"This smart and imaginative book describes how sunlight joined the list of scarce natural resources in America's darkening industrial cities, and how scientists and businessmen found solutions in a new and improved synthetic nature."—David Stradling, University of Cincinnati

CLOTH $40.00

What Did the Romans Know?

An Inquiry into Science and Worldmaking

Daryn Lehoux

"Engagingly written, replete with insights and flashes of humor, and addressing current debates in several disciplines, What Did the Romans Know? will finally put to rest the idea that 'Roman science' is a contradiction in terms."—Serafina Cuomo, Birkbeck, University of London

CLOTH $45.00

A Cultural History of Heredity

Staffan Müller-Wille and Hans-Jörg Rheinberger

"An enormously interesting and persuasive book that will speak not only to historians of science but also to biologists and general social and intellectual historians interested in the interface between the nitty-gritty of biology and the backdrop of social and cultural affairs."

—Frederick B. Churchill, Indiana University

CLOTH $45.00

After Freud Left

A Century of Psychoanalysis in America

Edited by John Burnham

"Emigration, transformation, distortion all played their part in the production of American psychoanalysis, which was infused to a remarkable extent in midcentury American life and now appears to be evaporating as quickly as it arrived. Does it leave traces? The historians and critics whose fine papers are collected in After Freud Left give nuanced and original answers."—John Forrester, University of Cambridge

CLOTH $35.00

Colonial and Postcolonial History

FROM CHICAGO

Empire's Children

Race, Filiation, and Citizenship in the French Colonies

Emmanuelle Saada

Translated by Arthur Goldhammer

"Empire's Children is one of the finest recent examples of history à la française—its research deep, its arguments rigorous, and its erudition impressive. It is a must-read for anyone interested in how colonialism shaped modern Europe and racial thinking."—Todd Shepard, Johns Hopkins University

PAPER $27.50

Mapping Europe's Borderlands

Russian Cartography in the Age of Empire

Steven Seegel

"This imposing work will prove indispensable in years and decades to come for anyone who wishes to understand the historical relationship between constructions of place and power."

—Timothy Snyder, Yale University

CLOTH $55.00

FROM THE UNIVERSITY OF WALES PRESS

Western Sahara

The Refugee Nation

Pablo San Martín

This book examines how a new Saharawi identity, culture, and society has emerged in refugee camps over the past few decades and highlights the impact that the Hispanic, Arab, and African worlds have had in shaping the contours of this nation.

PAPER $35.00

FROM AMSTERDAM UNIVERSITY PRESS

The Fateful Journey

The Expedition of Alexine Tinne and Theodor von Heuglin in Sudan (1863–1864)

Robert Joost Willink

The Fateful Journey creates a powerful portrait of Alexine Tinne throughout her life, from her start as a rich heiress in the Netherlands to her end as the intrepid explorer who risked—and lost—everything on a daring, doomed quest through Central Africa.

PAPER $65.00

History of the Senses

FROM CHICAGO

THE SOUNDS OF CAPITALISM

American Orchestras in the Nineteenth Century

EDITED BY John Spitzer

The Sounds of Capitalism

Advertising, Music, and the Conquest of Culture

Timothy D. Taylor

"This strikingly original work skillfully weaves together the author's unmatched knowledge of modern music and perceptive reading of previously untapped sources to reveal how popular music and advertising became mutually dependent industries across a century of change. It will force us to rethink what we know about the popular arts and consumer culture."—Gary Cross, author of

An All Consuming Century

CLOTH $35.00

American Orchestras in the Nineteenth Century

Edited by John Spitzer

"This superb collection of essays breaks new ground. The scholarship by preeminent scholars relies on new archival sources. . . . A long overdue contribution to understanding music within urban and public culture in America before 1900."—Leon Botstein, Bard College

CLOTH $55.00

Now in Paperback

Aguecheek's Beef, Belch's Hiccup, and Other Gastronomic Interjections

Literature, Culture, and Food Among the Early Moderns

Robert Appelbaum

"I consider this book excellent in almost every regard. Appelbaum's scholarship is deep, his prose immensely readable, and his thesis compelling from beginning to end."

—Thomas G. Olsen, Sixteenth Century Journal

PAPER $22.50

FROM REAKTION BOOKS

The Medieval Kitchen

A Social History with Recipes

Hannele Klemettilä

In this richly illustrated history, Hannele Klemettilä corrects common misconceptions about the food of the Middle Ages, acquainting the reader not only with the food culture but also the customs and ideologies associated with eating in medieval times.

CLOTH $39.00

The University of Chicago Press ■ www.press.uchicago.edu

Now in Paperback

FROM CHICAGO

In Hock

Pawning in America from Independence through the Great Depression

Wendy A. Woloson

"A remarkable and remarkably original book. With her keen ear for the stories and anecdotes that make the milieus of the working poor come alive, Woloson captures the vivid and untold history of pawnbroking from the late eighteenth century through the Great Depression."—Ann Fabian, Rutgers University

PAPER $22.50

Mom

The Transformation of Motherhood in Modern America

Rebecca Jo Plant

"Mom takes the reader back to the stunning changes that took place from the mid-nineteenth century to the mid-twentieth century in shifts from maternalism to attacks on 'momism' and then to mothers' self-fulfillment."—John Burnham, Ohio State University

PAPER $17.50

Buying Power

A History of Consumer Activism in America

Lawrence B. Glickman

"Glickman marvelously illuminates how Americans time and again have used their purchasing power not for self-indulgence but rather to prove themselves ethical, politically responsible citizens. This book demonstrates that 'we are what we buy.'"—Lizabeth Cohen, Harvard University

PAPER $27.50

Essays in Ancient and Modern Historiography

Arnaldo Momigliano

With a new Foreword by Anthony Grafton

"[Momigliano was] the world's leading student of the writing of history in the ancient world."—Donald Kagan, Yale University

PAPER $25.00

“This book teaches students how to squeeze the absolute most out of their college experience.”

LYNN O'SHAUGHNESSY, author of The College Solution

HOW TO SUCCEED IN COLLEGE

[While Really Trying]

A Professor's Inside Advice
JON B. GOULD

“How to Succeed in College is the best book I have ever read about the student experience and how to navigate academic life in any college or university. If we could somehow get every high school senior and college freshman, guidance counselor, and parent in the country to read this book, our college students would make the most out of their education—one of the most important investments they will ever make.”—SUSAN HERBST, president, University of Connecticut

“When I finished reading the book, I delivered it straight into the hands of my college-bound daughter.”—JOHN GILLIOM, Ohio University

Paper $14.00

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS www.press.uchicago.edu

New from ILLINOIS

Russia in Motion

Cultures of Human Mobility since 1850

Edited by JOHN RANDOLPH and EUGENE M. AVRUTIN

"This well-crafted collection of essays brings together a comprehensive selection of new research on mobility in Russia from the Tsarist Empire's westernmost provinces to the Far East. Of worldwide interest to scholars in migration studies as well as East Europeanist studies."—Dirk Hoerder, author of Cultures in Contact: World Migrations in the Second Millennium

Cloth $55.00 | Studies of World Migrations

The Black Chicago Renaissance

Edited by DARLENE CLARK HINE and JOHN McCLUSKEY JR.

Marshanda A. Smith, Managing Editor

"This landmark anthology comprehensively gathers work on the Black Chicago Renaissance. . . . An indispensable scholarly resource for generations to come."—Adam Green, author of Selling the Race: Culture, Community, and Black Chicago, 1940–1955

Contributors are Hilary Mac Austin, David T. Bailey, Murry N. DePillars, Samuel A. Floyd Jr., Erik S. Gellman, Jeffrey Helgeson, Darlene Clark Hine, John McCluskey Jr., Christopher Robert Reed, Elizabeth Schlabach, and Clovis E. Semmes.

Illus. *Cloth $80.00; Paper $27.95
The New Black Studies Series

Rebels and Runaways

Slave Resistance in Nineteenth-Century Florida

LARRY EUGENE RIVERS

"Most studies of antebellum slavery have either ignored or forgotten the bold actions of hundreds of enslaved Africans in Florida. Rivers's poignant study makes a strong case that this thrilling human drama—played out over many generations—constitutes perhaps the largest slave rebellion in American history."—James M. Denham, author of A Rogue's Paradise: Crime and Punishment in Antebellum Florida, 1821–1861

Illus. Cloth $55.00 | The New Black Studies Series

Sex, Sickness, and Slavery

Illness in the Antebellum South

MARLI F. WEINER with Mazie Hough

"Marli F. Weiner takes up questions of the body, sex, and race with insight and sophistication, leading the reader through a persuasive reading of physicians' medical reasoning and political self-interest. She convincingly reveals physicians as major political actors in this period and shows how science underwrote the power of white men."—Steven M. Stowe, author of Doctoring the South: Southern Physicians and Everyday Medicine in the Mid-Nineteenth Century

Cloth, $60.00

Rape in Chicago

Race, Myth, and the Courts

DAWN RAE FLOOD

Reassesses how individual men and women, particularly African Americans, understood and challenged rape myths and claimed their right to be protected as American citizens—protected by the State against violence, and protected from the State's prejudicial investigations and interrogations.

Illus. Cloth $55.00 | Women in American History

Black Women and Politics in New York City

JULIE A. GALLAGHER

"Fills a major gap in the historical literature. In particular, Gallagher's focus on party politics gives us a fresh perspective. A major contribution in the fields of African American, women's, and political history."—Victoria W. Wolcott, author of Remaking Respectability: African-American Women in Interwar Detroit

Illus. Cloth $55.00 | Women in American History

*Unjacketed

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS PRESS

Publishing Excellence since 1918

www.press.uillinois.edu

From the University of Georgia Press

doing recent history

on privacy, copyright, video games, institutional review boards, activist scholarship, and history that talks back

Edited by Claire Bond Potter and Renee C. Romano

Doing Recent History

On Privacy, Copyright, Video Games, Institutional Review Boards, Activist Scholarship, and History That Talks Back

Edited by Claire Bond Potter and Renee C. Romano

$22.95 paperback

SINCE 1970

Histories of Contemporary America

New in the series

Rumor, Repression, and Racial Politics

How the Harassment of Black Elected Officials Shaped Post-Civil Rights America

George Derek Musgrove

$24.95 paperback

Remaking Wormsloe Plantation

The Environmental History of a Lowcountry Landscape

Drew A. Swanson

Foreword by Paul S. Sutter

$34.95 hardcover

Blue Ridge Commons

Environmental Activism and Forest History in Western North Carolina

Kathryn Newfont

$26.95 paperback

War Upon the Land

Military Strategy and the Transformation of Southern Landscapes during the American Civil War

Lisa M. Brady

$24.95 paperback

Ruin Nation

Destruction and the American Civil War

Megan Kate Nelson

$24.95 paperback

Moses, Jesus, and the Trickster in the Evangelical South

Paul Harvey

$28.95 hardcover

Mercer University Lamar Memorial Lectures

Almost Free

A Story about Family and Race in Antebellum Virginia

Eva Sheppard Wolf

$19.95 paperback

The Faiths of Postwar Presidents

From Truman to Obama

David L. Holmes

$29.95 hardcover

George H. Shriver Lecture Series in Religion in American History

The Problem South

Region, Empire, and the New Liberal State, 1880-1930

Natalie J. Ring

$24.95 paperback

South Carolina Women

Their Lives and Times

Volume 3

Edited by Marjorie Julian

Spruill, Valinda W. Littlefield, and Joan Marie Johnson

$24.95 paperback

Southern Women:

Their Lives and Times

Buried Lives

Incarcerated in Early America

Edited by Michele Lise Tarter

and Richard Bell

$24.95 paperback

The Rise and Decline of the Redneck Riviera

An Insider's History of the Florida-Alabama Coast

Harvey H. Jackson III

$28.95 hardcover

The University of GEORGIA PRESS
www.ugapress.org

NEW TITLES IN

AN AMERICAN
PUBLICATIONA collaborative series supported by the Andrew W. Mellon FoundationCreolization and ContrabandCuraçao in the Early Modern Atlantic WorldLinda M. Rupert

$24.95 paperback

"This exploration of localized sociocultural mixing and extensive, illicit commerce on a Dutch Caribbean island makes for a fascinating study of colonial agency. The Antilles was the most dynamic site of creolization and contraband in the early modern world. Anyone interested in Atlantic history will want to read this excellent book." —Philip D. Morgan, author of Slave Counterpoint

Ordinary Lives in the Early CaribbeanReligion, Colonial Competition, and the Politics of ProfitKristen Block

$24.95 paperback

"Block's case studies of ordinary men and women in the Caribbean, and her creative use of the fragmentary sources they left, illuminate the ways in which they negotiated the spaces within and between empires, and their use of religious identification in those negotiations. By taking religion seriously and looking across colonial empires, she has produced a study that will be must reading for everyone interested in the early modern Atlantic." —Karen Ordahl Kupperman, New York University

Participating institutions

Visit our website at www.earlyamericanpresses.org

CRABGRASS CRUCIBLE

Suburban Nature and the Rise of Environmentalism in Twentieth-Century America

CHRISTOPHER C. SELLERS

"Sellers focuses on the place of nature in American suburbs and its influence on nature-seeking by suburbanites, confronting the definition of modern environmentalism. This book engages a central theme in urban history in a sophisticated and extraordinarily aggressive way."

—Martin Melosi, author of

Precious Commodity: Providing Water for America's Cities

384 pages $42.00

CHINESE MEXICANS

Transpacific Migration and the Search for a Homeland, 1910-1960

JULIA MARÍA SCHIAVONE CAMACHO

"A compelling story of the forming of Mexican Chinese families, their expulsion, and then struggle to return—often in fragments . . . renders visible both the human relationships shattered by nation-state imperatives and Chinese Mexicans' successes in forcing Mexico to rework its boundaries concerning citizenship so that they might come home."

—Madeline Hsu, University of Texas at Austin

256 pages $39.95

Published in association with the William P. Clements Center for Southwest Studies, Southern Methodist University

TRANSPACIFIC FIELD OF DREAMS

How Baseball Linked the United States and Japan in Peace and War

SAYURI GUTHRIE-SHIMIZU

"Beautifully written and richly researched, this book reveals that 'America's pastime' was truly a transnational game, one with power to bind two very disparate nations. This book will surely be the definitive study of an important topic with ramifications well beyond the world of sport."

—Barbara Keys, University of Melbourne

344 pages $39.95

COMMONSENSE ANTICOMMUNISM

Labor and Civil Liberties between the World Wars

JENNIFER LUFF

"An original piece of scholarship that makes a substantial contribution to the history of communism, anticommunism, labor, and American political history. This well-written and provocative book is evenhanded in its approach to controversial issues—readers will learn a great deal from it."

—Eric Arnesen, George Washington University

304 pages $39.95

MEMORIES OF CONQUEST

Becoming Mexicano in Colonial Guatemala

LAURA E. MATTHEW

"Makes significant contributions to our understanding of the Spanish Conquest, the colonial histories of Mexico and Guatemala, and the nature of the Guatemalan nation."

—Matthew Restall, author of The Black Middle: Africans, Mayas, and Spaniards in Colonial Yucatan

336 pages $45.00

A project of First Peoples: New Directions in Indigenous Studies

DIXIE DHARMA

Inside a Buddhist Temple in the American South

JEFF WILSON

"Wilson traces the pluralistic Buddhism practiced in the American South and explores the many and varied ways in which regional dynamics influence Buddhist organizations and practitioners to create this vibrant community. This is a book of real importance."

—Wendy Cadge, Brandeis University

296 pages $36.95

Sign up for monthly new book announcements, special offers and more at www.uncpress.unc.edu

@BOOK

Most UNC Press books are also available as E-Books.

1922
90
2012

THE UNIVERSITY of NORTH CAROLINA PRESS

at bookstore or 800 848-6224 • www.uncpress.unc.edu • uncpresslitug.com

CELEBRATING 90 YEARS OF PUBLISHING EXCELLENCE

NEW from PENN PRESS

CALIFORNIA CRUCIBLE

The Forging of Modern American Liberalism
Jonathan Bell

2012 | 352 pages | Cloth | $47.50

PIETY AND PUBLIC FUNDING

Evangelicals and the State in Modern America
Axel R. Schäfer

2012 | 288 pages | Cloth | $45.00

TAX AND SPEND

The Welfare State, Tax Politics, and the Limits of American Liberalism
Molly C. Michelmore

2012 | 248 pages | Cloth | $39.95

NEW IN PAPERBACK

PUBLIC CULTURE

Diversity, Democracy, and Community in the United States

Edited by Marguerite S. Shaffer

2011 | 392 pages | Paper | $26.50

ASTOUNDING WONDER

Imagining Science and Science Fiction in Interwar America

John Cheng

2012 | 384 pages | Cloth | $45.00

CONSUMING PLEASURES

Intellectuals and Popular Culture in the Postwar World
Daniel Horowitz

2012 | 528 pages | Cloth | $34.95

THE RIGHT AND LABOR IN AMERICA

Politics, Ideology, and Imagination

Edited by Nelson Lichtenstein and Elizabeth Tandy Shermer

2012 | 432 pages | Cloth | $49.95

NEW IN PAPERBACK

BLACK CONSERVATIVE INTELLECTUALS IN MODERN AMERICA

Michael L. Ondaatje

2011 | 232 pages | Paper | $22.50

MAKING SEAFOOD SUSTAINABLE

American Experiences in Global Perspective
Mansel G. Blackford

2012 | 296 pages | Cloth | $45.00

NEW IN PAPERBACK

CITIZENS OF A CHRISTIAN NATION

Evangelical Missions and the Problem of Race in the Nineteenth Century
Derek Chang

2012 | 248 pages | Paper | $24.95

1812

War and the Passions of Patriotism
Nicole Eustace

2012 | 352 pages | Cloth | $34.95

ELIZABETH PATTERSON BONAPARTE

An American Aristocrat in the Early Republic

Charlene M. Boyer Lewis

2012 | 312 pages | Cloth | $34.95

JOHN WOOLMAN'S PATH TO THE PEACEABLE KINGDOM

A Quaker in the British Empire

Geoffrey Plank

2012 | 320 pages | Cloth | $39.95

NEW IN PAPERBACK

DEATH IN THE NEW WORLD

Cross-Cultural Encounters, 1492–1800

Erik R. Seeman

2012 | 384 pages | Paper | $24.95

POLITICAL GASTRONOMY

Food and Authority in the English Atlantic World

Michael A. LaCombe

2012 | 240 pages | Cloth | $39.95

NEW NETHERLAND AND THE DUTCH ORIGINS OF AMERICAN RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

Evan Haefeli

2012 | 384 pages | Cloth | $45.00

NEW IN PAPERBACK

FRIENDS AND STRANGERS

The Making of a Creole Culture in Colonial Pennsylvania

John Smolenski

2012 | 416 pages | Paper | $24.95

NEW IN PAPERBACK

SENECA POSSESSED

Indians, Witchcraft, and Power in the Early American Republic

Matthew Dennis

2012 | 328 pages | Paper | $24.95

A NATION OF WOMEN

Gender and Colonial Encounters Among the Delaware Indians
Gunlög Fur

2012 | 264 pages | Paper | $24.95

NEW IN PAPERBACK

A NEW NATION OF GOODS

The Material Culture of Early America
David Jaffee

2012 | 424 pages | Paper | $27.50

UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA
PRESS

www.pennpress.org
800-537-5487

KANSAS

The Religious Beliefs of America's Founders

Reason, Revelation, Revolution

Gregg L. Frazer

"Sophisticated, well-documented, and forcefully argued. Extreme partisans who champion 'Christian America' or complete secularism will not like this book, but all other readers should come away much better informed about the past and also much better situated to adjudicate religious-political debates today."—Mark Noll, author of God and Race in American Politics: A Short History

American Political Thought
312 pages, Cloth $34.95

Leak

Why Mark Felt Became Deep Throat

Max Holland

"This important and gripping addition to the Watergate saga challenges, if not discredits, heroic portrayals of Deep Throat in Woodward and Bernstein's All the President's Men."

—Library Journal (starred review)

"Vividly told and quite engrossing. Reading it on the subway, I missed my stop."

—Steve Aftergood, Secrecy News

"An assault on the foundation myth of modern American journalism."—Commentary

304 pages, Cloth $29.95

War's Desolating Scourge

The Union's Occupation of North Alabama

Joseph W. Danielson

"A perceptive study of an important but historiographically neglected region of the Confederacy. Essential reading for anyone interested in the experience of the Southern people under Union military occupation."

—Stephen V. Ash, author of When the Yankees Came: Conflict and Chaos in the Occupied South, 1861–1865

Modern War Studies

248 pages, 16 photos, 4 maps, Cloth $34.95

Guide to the Battle of Gettysburg

Second Edition, Revised and Expanded

Edited by Jay Luvaas, Harold W. Nelson, and Leonard J. Fullenkamp

This long-anticipated revised edition boasts double the number of maps, as well as new sections highlighting the strategic and operational context for the Gettysburg campaign.

"These guides are the most thorough, detailed, and accurate books of their kind. Indeed, they are unique. I have used them to lead guided tours of several battlefields, with great success."—James M. McPherson, author of Battle Cry of Freedom: The Era of the Civil War

U.S. Army War College Guides to Civil War Battles 348 pages, 32 photos, 39 maps,
Cloth $39.95, Paper $17.95

KANSAS

Uniting the Tribes

The Rise and Fall of Pan-Indian Community on the Crow Reservation

Frank Rzeczkowski

"Rzeczkowski's on-the-ground narrative explores big and important historical questions, brilliantly revealing both the rise of cross-tribal identities and the processes that undermined them. His study has much to teach us about Indian peoples and about the uneven power of colonialism."

—Fred Hoxie, author of Parading through History: The Making of the Crow Nation in America, 1805–1935

302 pages, 18 photos, Cloth $39.95

The Wehrmacht Retreats

Fighting a Lost War, 1943

Robert M. Citino

"This is Citino's best work to date, featuring impeccable research, a reference apparatus that alone is almost worth the book's purchase, and a page-turning style that carries readers forward without skimming or skipping."—Dennis Showalter, author of Hitler's Panzers: The Lightning Attacks that Revolutionized Warfare

Modern War Studies

428 pages, 35 photos, 15 maps, Cloth $34.95

Beyond Rosie the Riveter

Women of World War II in American Popular Graphic Art

Donna B. Knaff

"The images Knaff discusses are rich and provocative. An impressive work on a fascinating topic that will make a significant contribution to a lively critical discussion of women and war, of gender roles during WWII, and of the history of American graphic art during this era."—Laura Browder, author of When Janey Comes Marching Home: Portraits of Women Combat Veterans

CultureAmerica

224 pages, 30 photos, Cloth $34.95

Scarlet Fields

The Combat Memoir of a World War I Medal of Honor Hero

John Lewis Barkley

Introduction and notes by Steven Trout

Afterword by Joan Barkley Wells

"An absorbing and exciting account of World War I combat and one of the most important American war narratives. . . . A must-read for anyone interested in soldiers' experiences of warfare."—Edward G. Lengel, author of To Conquer Hell: The Meuse-Argonne, 1918

Modern War Studies

240 pages, 14 photos, Cloth $29.95

University Press of Kansas

Phone 785-864-4155 • Fax 785-864-4586 • www.kansaspress.ku.edu

The Truth Machine

A Social History of the Lie Detector

Geoffrey C. Bunn

"Surpasses all previous studies of lie detectors in illuminating the historical and cultural contexts in which this controversial device originated."

—Howard Segal,
University of Maine

$34.95 hardcover

Planting an Empire

The Early Chesapeake in British North America

Jean B. Russo and J. Elliott Russo

The "sister" colonies of Virginia and Maryland followed divergent social and economic paths.

$25.00 paperback

Plague, Fear, and Politics in San Francisco's Chinatown

Guenther B. Risse

Risse offers insight into the clash of Eastern and Western cultures in a time of medical emergency.

$39.95 hardcover

The Political Philosophy of Alexander Hamilton

Michael P. Federici

"A comprehensive take on Hamilton that will stir discussion."—George Thomas, author of The Madisonian Constitution

$24.95 paperback

Sound Clash

Listening to American Studies

edited by Kara Keeling and Josh Kun

An interdisciplinary approach to the study of sound.

$35.00 paperback

Expectations and Fabrications

Beatlemania

Technology, Business, and Teen Culture in Cold War America

André Millard

The Beatle's success depended on new developments in the way music was produced, recorded, sold, and consumed.

$22.95 paperback

The Unfinished Life of Benjamin Franklin

Douglas Anderson

"An interesting and thoughtful meditation on Franklin's autobiography."—Carla Mulford, editor of The Cambridge Companion to Benjamin Franklin

$55.00 hardcover

Prescribed

Writing, Filling, Using, and Abusing the Prescription in Modern America

edited by Jeremy A. Greene and Elizabeth Siegel Watkins

"A blueprint for a new standard in the history of health care in America."—Elaine C. Stroud, coeditor of American Pharmacy

$30.00 paperback

Trees of Life

A Visual History of Evolution
Theodore W. Pietsch

For the past 450 years, tree-like branching diagrams have been created to show the interrelationships of organisms. This book celebrates the beauty and ingenuity of these trees of life.

$69.95 hardcover

Einstein's Jewish Science

Physics at the Intersection of Politics and Religion

Steven Gimbel

"A fascinating engagement with the nature of Judaism and of science."—Rabbi Michael Lerner

$24.95 hardcover

The Inquisition in New Spain, 1536–1820

A Documentary History
edited and translated by John F. Chuchiak IV

"Destined to become the standard reference guide to the Inquisition in the New World."

—Javier Villa-Flores, author of Dangerous Speech: A Social History of Blasphemy in Colonial Mexico

$35.00 paperback

Communism on Tomorrow Street

Mass Housing and Everyday Life after Stalin

Steven E. Harris

Harris argues that moving to modern single-family apartments allowed ordinary urban dwellers to experience Khrushchev's thaw.

Woodrow Wilson Center Press

$60.00 hardcover

Now in paperback

Henri IV of France

His Reign and Age

Vincent J. Pitts

$39.95 paperback

Encountering Revolution

Haiti and the Making of the Early Republic

Ashli White

$25.00 paperback

THE JOHNS HOPKINS UNIVERSITY PRESS

1-800-537-5487 • press.jhu.edu

American Historical Association

New Titles in the Essays on Global and Comparative History series

Locating the United States in Twentieth-Century World History

by Carl J. Guarneri

The Impact of the Two World Wars in a Century of Violence

by John H. Morrow Jr.

World Migration in the Long Twentieth Century

by Jose C. Moya and Adam McKeown

Women in the Twentieth-Century World

by Bonnie G. Smith

Twentieth-Century Urbanization: In Search of an Urban Paradigm for an Urban World

by Howard Spodek

A Century of Environmental Transitions

by Richard P. Tucker

All of the above titles are $10 (AHA members receive a 30% discount).
For more information on these and other AHA titles, and to purchase, visit the AHA's online Pubshop at www.historians.org/pubshop.

MOVING?

Please go to www.historians.org and log in to AHA member services to change your mailing address.

You can also mail, fax, or e-mail your address change to the AHA:

The American Historical Review
American Historical Association
400 A Street, SE
Washington, D.C. 20003-3889

Fax: 202-544-8307
E-mail: members@historians.org

If possible, please make address changes on the mailing label sheet that accompanied this issue. Otherwise, please send both your old address and your new address, as well as your membership number.

PLEASE SEND THIS INFORMATION AT LEAST SIX WEEKS IN ADVANCE OF YOUR MOVE.

If you have any questions, please contact the AHA membership department at 202-544-2422.

THANK YOU!

American Historical Association

What Does the AHA Do for You

- Publishes the American Historical Review, now in its 116th year as the premier journal in the field.
- Publishes Perspectives on History, the only journal that explores all aspects of historical practice—ranging from the classroom to the movie theater, and on the web and in the archives. It is the only publication that tries to speak broadly to what historians have in common, regardless of where they are employed.
- Maintains a highly visible presence on the web, Facebook, Twitter, and LinkedIn to disseminate news and information relevant to the profession and to provide access to a vast array of useful resources including data and analyses about the historical profession.
- Develops and publishes a wide array of pamphlets on historical teaching and research such as the Essays on Global and Comparative History and New Essays on American Constitutional History, as well as a variety of professional pamphlets including From Concept to Completion: A Dissertation Writing Guide and Getting an Academic Job in History.
- Organizes an annual meeting that brings together more than 4,000 historians to discuss the latest findings in historical research and the future of the discipline, while offering a wide range of other networking and professional opportunities.
- Offers dozens of prizes and awards for distinguished scholarship, teaching, and work in and for history.
- Awards more than 100 grants to graduate students and junior faculty members for research and travel.
- Promotes efforts such as the National History Day program that elevate history education at all levels.
- Draws together more 100 affiliated societies and historical organizations, encouraging dialogue and support for each other's professional interests.
- Publishes the Directory of History Departments, Historical Organizations, and Historians, both in print and online, which provides comprehensive information about historians at universities, colleges, and other institutions.
- Supports listserves for department chairs and directors of graduate studies, to assist in the dissemination of best practices and professional development.
- Advocates for history in Washington, D.C., both directly and through substantial financial support for the National Coalition for History.
- Supports the efforts of the National History Center to promote the advancement of historical knowledge to a wider public.
- Helps to protect the interests of historians as users and producers of intellectual materials, by working with a wide range of actors in the world of scholarly communication to ensure both fair use and equitable cost recovery measures to enable continuing dissemination of research.

Your dues are the AHA's small endorsement for the discipline. Join the AHA now and share its responsibility and recommitment to the initiatives and responsibilities that the AHA has undertaken to benefit the history profession and to ensure the prosperity of history in the United States. Join now at www.historians.org/members

Index of Advertisers

American Historical Association
Covers 2 & 3, 1(a), 25(a)–27(a)

Cambridge University Press
2(a)–3(a)

HarperCollins Publishers 4(a)

Johns Hopkins University
Press 24(a)

McGill-Queen's University
Press 5(a)

New York University
Press 6(a), 18(a)

Northern Illinois University
Press 19(a)

Oxford University Press 7(a)

Palgrave Macmillan 8(a)

Princeton University Press Cover 4

Stanford University Press 9(a)

University of Alabama Press 10(a)

University of Chicago
Press 11(a)–16(a)

University of Georgia
Press 18(a)–19(a)

University of Illinois Press 17(a)

University of Nebraska Press 19(a)

University of North Carolina
Press 20(a)

University of Pennsylvania Press 21(a)

University Press of Kansas 22(a)–23(a)

Mark your calendars for the:

Registration will begin in the autumn.

For more information, visit:

www.historians.org/annual

The International Human Rights Movement

A History
Aryeh Neier

"Aryeh Neier's insightful account of the human rights movement underlines the crucial role played by individuals and human rights defenders in speaking out against abuses. This book describes many of the human rights challenges that remain and is essential reading for all those wishing to understand the political challenges of our times."

—Kofi Annan, former secretary-general of the United Nations (1997–2006)

Cloth $35.00 978-0-691-13515-1

Mothers of Conservatism

Women and the Postwar Right
Michelle M. Nickerson

"Michelle Bachmann and Sarah Palin? They had antecedents. Many, many antecedents. Michelle Nickerson uncovers an entire undiscovered lost continent of right-wing organizing—and in the process produces a wealth of new and profound insights about grassroots conservatism as a whole. A remarkable book."

—Rick Perlstein, author of Nixonland: The Rise of a President and the Fracturing of America

Cloth $35.00 978-0-691-12184-0

Irish Nationalists and the Making of the Irish Race

Bruce Nelson

"This fine work of scholarship makes a valuable contribution to the literature on Irish nationalism and the history of nationalism generally. Nelson offers a cogent critique of those Irish nationalists who were so caught up in their own narrow nationalistic grievances that any sympathetic engagement with other reform movements was ruled out."

—Cormac Ó Gráda, author of Famine: A Short History

Cloth $45.00 978-0-691-15312-4

The Black Hole of Empire

History of a Global Practice of Power
Partha Chatterjee

"This is a powerfully argued account of the origins and subsequent justification of British rule in India, and an exploration of the response by Bengali elites to colonialism. A work of classic history, this book carries an intellectual power and brilliance of insight that will excite much interest and comment."

—Thomas Metcalf, professor emeritus of history, University of California, Berkeley

Paper $27.95 978-0-691-15201-1

Cloth $80.00 978-0-691-15200-4

PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS

See our books at press.princeton.edu

